PA: Security plan will be in on Monday

By DANA HARMAN and HILAL KUTLER

The Palestinian security working paper is near completion and will be given to the CIA on Monday, in accordance with the established timetable, Palestinian officials said yesterday.

"We will be sharing our security paper with the Americans when the implementation period begins - Monday - as was agreed upon," said negotiator Saeb Erekat. "There is no need for the Israelis to make a fuss. We will honor the Wye Memorandum to the minute and in accordance with the time frame."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's spokesman Aviv Bushinsky said that while Israel had understood the plan was meant to be presented tomorrow, it would be welcome on Monday. As soon as it is presented to the Americans, we will convene the cabinet for ratification of the deal," he said, citing Monday as a possible day for the meeting.

"They give - they get. They don't give - they don't get," Netanyahu told reporters yesterday. "That's the way it works, that is how it [the agreement] is built, and that is the way it's going to be from now on."

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, who returned to Gaza after a short tour of neighboring Arab countries, expressed confidence that both sides would keep their promises. "I think that what has been signed will be implemented accurately," he said.

Arafat added that he is not concerned about the postponement of the cabinet meeting.

Although the paper will only be presented - probably verbally - on Monday, Israeli and Palestinian security teams are to meet Friday to discuss some of its aspects, said Erekat.

US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, meanwhile, has telephoned Netanyahu. Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, and Arafat in recent days to emphasize the importance of beginning the implementation of the Wye Memorandum on time.

According to State Department spokesman James Rubin, President Bill Clinton has already accepted an invitation to address members of the Palestinian National Council when they convene - according to the timetable - in December.

Rubin urged that no one "exaggerate" Netanyahu's delaying the cabinet vote, saying the US has an understanding from both the Palestinians and Israelis as to their next steps. Seeking to quickly defuse the situation, he arranged an early morning conference call with Israeli and Arab reporters to emphasize that the US knew all along that such "bumps along the road" would occur.

That view was underscored in a 90-minute meeting Albright hosted later in the day with a group of more than 20 Jewish and Arab-Americans. She appealed for their backing for the Wye deal, and urged the Arab-Americans to drum up support among the states of the region, according to Larry Rubin, executive vice chairman of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs.

The US's special Middle East envoy Dennis Ross, who also addressed the gathering, "expressed confidence the sides will be able to work it out," said a participant.

Police to crack down on incitement against PM

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH

Police will crack down on extremists whose incitement encourages violence against Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and other government officials, officials said yesterday.

National investigations head Cmdr. Yossi Sidon said police are concerned over recent statements calling Netanyahu a traitor and other statements made by right-wing extremists outside the prime minister's residence on Monday night, during an angry protest against the Wye accord and the terrorist murder of Kiryat Arba resident Danny Vargas.

"We are very concerned, especially when taking into account the terrible experience we had in the past that led to such grave consequences," Sidon told Israel Radio yesterday. He said anyone heard speaking in such a manner will be investigated.

Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein also said that the police and state prosecutors would not hesitate to take action against those who incite to violence, including public figures. Rubinstein, who called for restraint on the part of politicians as well as demonstrators, said the law is sufficient to deal with all offenders.

Sidon ordered police to find the extremists who called out "Bring down Netanyahu at any cost" and "Bibi must be destroyed" on Monday night. He also ordered Jerusalem police to investigate statements made by former Kach activist Noam Federman and Rabbi

Moshe Levinger during eulogies they delivered at Vargas's funeral.

Federman said his statements at the funeral were legitimate and Levinger said on an Arutz 7 radio interview that he had said no more than "the prime minister is endangering the lives of people here."

Yehudit Tayar, spokeswoman for the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza, said it is a shame that, instead of respecting the dead and their families, a stage was given to certain elements known for their extreme views.

General Security Service officials are reportedly concerned over the increase in incitement to violence and have not ruled out the possibility of another political assassination by Jewish extremists.

The GSS has reportedly stepped up its activities in the settlements and is monitoring the movement of certain extremists.

Many settlers say the crackdown is reminiscent of the days following the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

To press incitement charges against someone, there is a need to define the dividing line between freedom of expression and words that incite to murder, said Prof. Menahem Hofnung of the Hebrew University Law Faculty.

The problem of incitement is not unique to Israel, but occurs in many countries, including the US, he said. One must determine if certain expressions are in fact incitement. "For instance, instead of calling the prime minister a traitor, someone may say his actions are betraying the country and betraying its security interests. Can a person be put on trial for that?"

PM wins Likud show of support

By SARAH HONIG and MICHAEL TUDELMAN

The message to the Palestinians is "loud, clear, and as simple as can be," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last night told a largely friendly crowd of Likud central committee members.

"If the Palestinians give, they will get," he continued. "If they won't give, they won't get."

The audience loved it and responded to Netanyahu with rhythmic chants, especially as he launched one of his most stinging attacks yet against Labor Party leader Ehud Barak. He also heralded the creation of a new leadership team: himself, Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, and Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

But MK Ze'ev (Benny) Begin later slammed the Wye Memorandum, calling it a horror, idiocy and an "agreement of defeat." He also termed Netanyahu "Arafat's friend."

"If the central committee approves the agreement, the Likud will lose its heart and soul, its image, ideology, faith, and raison d'etre," Begin said.

The committee did not vote on the memorandum. Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi, who chairs the body, said there was no point in holding such a vote since the Palestinians had not yet come up with a security plan.

Netanyahu said that he brought back from Wye "tremendous achievements" and that he is proud of what he and his team accomplished.

The assembly at the Cinemas Auditorium in Tel Aviv was a mixed lot, as in most Likud central committee forums. As is the Likud practice, entry was not limited to members only and in the audience this time were many settlers from Judea, Samaria, and Gaza who are not Likud members and stood out in their crocheted kippot.

Some were quietly ejected during Netanyahu's speech when they began to interrupt him. In all, however, the members were on their best behavior and proceedings were calm, especially given the emotive subject. A few home-made signs saying "A bad agreement" were hoisted.

Netanyahu and Sharon excited the audience, while Mordechai largely bored them.

Netanyahu said that, "despite the Left's denials, the Palestinians expected three 30% withdrawals, leaving 90% of the territory in their hands before the final-status talks. We had to lower these expectations. We found an expanded accord and had to squeeze it back to 10% and a further three as a nature reserve, in which we have full military con-rol and which they cannot populate or build in," he added.

Barak, Netanyahu continued, now says that "he would have gotten a better deal and ceded less. This man has no shame. Months ago when there were only rumors of US proposals, he demanded that we automatically accept whatever the Americans decree."

Netanyahu asked: "Could Barak withstand pressure in the final-status talks? Who could conduct better negotiations - the Barak, Yossi Beilin, and Yossi Sarid team, or interchangeably the Barak, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, and Ronni Milo team?"

"Compare these combinations to Arik [Sharon], Itzik [Mordechai], and myself and tell me who will negotiate better, who will safeguard Jerusalem, the settlements, the land?" he asked.

The committee audience answered with a standing ovation and chants of "Bibi, King of Israel." They were just as enthusiastic when Sharon mounted the podium. He came despite being ill with the flu.

Sharon began with a long, semi-poetic description of historic sites in Judea and Samaria and of the settlers. He remarked that his own "mother and father looked the same. This is how it all began, the entire Zionist endeavor, this is how Eretz Yisrael was built. You are the fortress of the entire state," he told the settlers.

Calls for unity tame the crowd at party rally was broadcasting the proceedings live, perhaps expecting rowdy scenes, like those the Likud central committee has provided in recent years. But this time the committee was well controlled, and most of the little heckling that there was came from outsiders, mainly settlers.

ANALYSIS

By SARAH HONIG

Even Netanyahu's most uncompromising opponent, MK Ze'ev (Benny) Begin, was not accorded anything like the near violent reception which Geula Cohen received when she dared oppose the Camp David Accords two decades ago. Cohen left the party soon after and helped found Tehiya.

Few in the Likud would be surprised if after Begin's vitriol, he can remain in the party. The consensus is that he already has one foot out and is perhaps only waiting to see if new elections are called soon.

Netanyahu's other critic, MK Uzi Landau, was no softer, though less acidic in tone. Observers could not fail to note that the sons of the Revisionist founding fathers were left nearly disenfranchised in the party, as was Netanyahu's mentor, Moshe Arens.

Almost all Fighting Family descendants oppose the agreement, including Tzahi Hanegbi and Limor Livnat. Their line is, in Livnat's words, it is "an utter distortion to claim that we have lost our ideology and are indistinguishable from Labor. It matters a great deal that this government not fall, because the alternative is calamitous. We must stay united and keep this government alive."

The note she struck perhaps explains why this central committee session was so tame. Many members do not like the agreement and could not evince enthusiasm. At the same time, most fear lending a hand to bringing their own government down.

The result was a mixed mood of disappointment and acknowledgement that there is no other alternative. It was a sad and subdued central committee, rather than the high-spirited lot we have come to know.

Soldier seriously wounded in Lebanon

By DAVID RUDGE

A Givati Brigade soldier was seriously wounded in a mortar attack on an IDF outpost in the western sector of the security zone during fierce fighting in the region yesterday.

Later in the evening, four South Lebanese Army soldiers were wounded - one of them seriously - in bombardments in the eastern sector of the zone.

The attacks by Hizbullah and apparently Amal were the most concerted in several weeks and prompted heavy return fire by the IDF.

The Givati soldier was wounded during a mortar barrage on the IDF's Karkum position. He was evacuated by helicopter to Haifa's Rambam Hospital, where deputy director Dr. Zvi Ben-Ishai said he underwent surgery for serious head wounds.

Early reports said the soldier was hit in the head by shrapnel and one piece was lodged near his optic nerve, causing concern he may have been blinded.

The SLA soldiers were wounded, one of them seriously and two moderately, in a mortar barrage on the SLA's Kantara position. They were also evacuated to Rambam. The fourth soldier was reported to be suffering from light injuries and was treated at the scene.

Israel yesterday lodged a complaint with the Grapes of Wrath monitoring group over Tuesday's Hizbullah shelling of Ras Bayada, in which three civilians were wounded, calling it a flagrant violation of the understandings.

IMA: Health funds forcing use of cheaper drugs

By JUDY SEGEL

In their efforts to save money, the health funds are setting up bureaucratic barriers to discourage doctors from prescribing expensive medications included in the basket of health services, encouraging them to give less expensive drugs that are sometimes less effective, Israel Medical Association (IMA) chairman Dr. Yoram Blachar told The Jerusalem Post yesterday.

The IMA has received complaints from the various medical societies about cases in which health funds pressured doctors to replace more advanced drugs with cheaper ones, he said.

The IMA, he added, constantly tells its members that medical considerations must be given priority over economic ones when prescribing, and that any physician who is instructed by the insurer to give less effective drugs will get legal and professional support from the IMA.

Blachar blamed "one man - the Treasury's Haim Peltz [in charge of budgets for the health system] - for the current health fund policy of cutting expenses at all costs."

Several doctors said the insurers are careful not to state in writing that more expensive drugs must be replaced by cheaper ones.

Dr. Gadi Neuman, head of Kupat Holim Clalit's Petah Tikva administration, issued a letter - obtained by the Post - to all clinic directors, independent doctors, and Clalit pharmacists in the area on September 3 saying that four cardiovascular drugs must be taken off the shelves and replaced with cheaper ones.

However, Clalit spokeswoman Anat Weiss said the health fund itself caught this "error" and sent out a correction a few weeks ago, declaring that patients who arrive with a prescription for any of the four more expensive drugs should be sent back to their doctor to receive one of the cheaper drugs.

However, the correction added, "if the doctor believes that the drug should not be substituted, he must make a request to the director of the administration."

Weiss said that "all the drugs in the basket are available. There is no decision or instruction in the health fund that prohibits the use of a certain drug in the basket if the doctor thinks it's preferable from medical considerations. But there is no reason not to give the cheaper medications if they are just as effective."

Prof. Micha Levy, a senior clinical pharmacologist and chairman of the internal medicine division of Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem's Ein Kerem, said that "without naming any specific drugs or any specific health funds, I do see in the field that the conditions of some patients have suffered because of drug substitution."

Dr. Boaz Lev, associate director-general of the Health Ministry, said that "by and large, patients are getting the drugs they need, but there may be some exceptions. We will investigate any complaints made, but the health funds must be free to save money by giving equivalent drugs if they're just as effective."

Dr. Karmy Rubin, the Health Ministry ombudsman, said she would keep an eye out for complaints sent to her office about substitution of drugs listed in the basket of services; the IMA will send out letters to its members asking about pressure not to prescribe necessary drugs.

Meanwhile, Na'amat yesterday filed a class-action suit against Kupat Holim Maccabi for refusing in-vitro fertilization treatments to women members, even though the treatment is included in the basket of health services.

Smyrek pleads innocent

Stephan Smyrek, 26, a German citizen arrested on suspicion of plotting a suicide bombing said yesterday that he had come to Israel for a vacation and not to carry out an attack.

He pleaded not guilty in Tel Aviv District Court and his lawyer, Ronit Robinson, said she will argue that her client's confession was made under duress and should not be admissible in court.

Robinson said she would be petitioning the High Court to disclose classified materials that may be helpful in Smyrek's defense.

Smyrek was arrested on November 18 as he arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport. He is accused of plotting with Hizbullah to carry out a bombing.

The trial will reconvene on January 3 when the prosecution begins its case. AP

Panel probing mental patient's escape, death

Health Minister Yehoshua Matza yesterday appointed a committee to investigate the case of a man who escaped from Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon before being admitted to the psychiatric department and was found dead earlier in the day.

The patient, 23, was injured when admitted to the hospital on Tuesday, the Health Ministry spokesman said, but he did not have details on the nature of the injuries. After the man was treated, he agreed to be hospitalized in the psychiatric department, but on his way there, he disappeared, the spokesman said.

The police began to look for him, but yesterday at noon he was found dead. The ministry committee consists of two senior psychiatrists and a ministry security expert. Judy Siegel

Maccabi TA plane makes emergency landing

A plane carrying the Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball club to Yugoslavia was forced to turn around and make an emergency landing at Ben-Gurion Airport after experiencing engine trouble yesterday.

The chartered Aeroel Airlines Dash-8 twin turboprop landed without incident, the Airports Authority said.

"The captain had detected a loss of power in one of the engines," the Authority said.

Israel Radio reported the team would resume the journey on another plane to play in tonight's EuroLeague match against Red Star Belgrade. Reuters

Ulpan Akiva wins UNESCO prize

Ulpan Akiva has won the 1998 UNESCO Peace Prize, Education Ministry deputy director-general Yair Levin announced yesterday.

The prize will be awarded in Paris in December. The ulpan was established in 1951 by Sholomit Katznelson and has served as an institution for learning Hebrew and Arabic since then. Current director-general Efraim Lapid expanded the program to include study days for teachers, students, and the public regarding relations between Arabs and Jews and those between observant and non-observant Israelis. A new course recently opened there in which National Service young women study to become Arabic teachers. Education Minister Yitzhak Levy will visit the ulpan today. Aryeh Dean Cohen

Turkey may delay Syria border exercises

Turkey might delay military exercises on the Syrian border after striking a deal with Damascus that eased a security crisis between the two countries, NTV television reported yesterday.

Syria last week bowed to Turkish demands to drop support for Kurdish guerrillas active in Turkey's southeast. Turkey had threatened military action and announced the army maneuvers.

President Ezer Weizman was in Ankara yesterday for 75th anniversary celebrations of the proclamation of the Turkish Republic. He was expected to meet with Turkish Suleyman Demirel. Batsheva Tsor and Reuters

GSS releases partial account of the Ora killing

The two suspects in the murder of Itamar Doron and wounding of Ilan Mazon at the Ora spring earlier this month asked their victims whether they had left the keys in their car and then shot them, according to the General Security Service.

The GSS said suspects Munir Jaddah and Majid Mutawa approached the two men, who were newly observant and had gone to the spring for ritual cleansing.

Most details of the investigation remain classified. Irim.

Meanwhile, threats have been directed against members of the settlers council who publicly condemned the murder of elderly Palestinian farmer Mohammed Zalmout. Police believe the fatal bludgeoning was carried out by a 28-year-old Jew with a violent background, who is identified with the Braslav hassidim.

"We have been warned by the GSS that all the council leaders are on the Hamas hit list. We are warned not to travel in isolated areas or Area A alone and, on the other hand, we have received threats from a group of Jewish extremists," said Thyar.

A rifle bullet was recently left under the windshield wiper of a car belonging to council director Aharon Domb and council chairman Pinhas Wallerstein received a Women in Green postcard that said: "If you go in the same direction as the traitor Netanyahu, you Pinhas Wallerstein will also be responsible for the spilling of blood."

"We are very disturbed by the implications, but we are not the kind of group that would write such things," said group co-founder Ruth Matar, who noted that Women in Green has also complained to the police about hate mail and phone threats.

Top Republicans: Don't free Pollard

WASHINGTON (Reuters) — Republican congressional leaders have urged President Bill Clinton not to grant a reprieve or pardon to convicted Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard, imprisoned since 1985.

In a letter dated October 27 and made public yesterday, House Speaker Newt Gingrich, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, and the chairmen of the House and Senate intelligence committees, Rep. Porter

Goss of Florida and Sen. Richard Shelby of Alabama, called Pollard "one of the most notorious traitors in US history."

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu had pushed for Pollard's release during the Wye summit.

Clinton refused Netanyahu's request to immediately grant clemency to the former US naval intelligence analyst, convicted of providing the Israelis with highly sensitive intelligence. But he said he would review the case.

Republican leaders, in their letter to Clinton, wrote that Pollard had "betrayed the trust placed in him and undermined the security of our country."

"Should Pollard be released, there is every reason to believe, based on his own statements, that he would resume his treacherous conduct and further damage the national security of the United States," the lawmakers warned.

Clinton last reviewed the case in 1996, and declined at the time to release Pollard or shorten his life sentence.

Republican leaders, in their letter to Clinton, noted that the president, in making his decision, cited the gravity of the crimes and Pollard's lack of remorse. "Absolutely nothing has changed," they wrote.

Ramon causes uproar with unity gov't bid

By LIAT COLLINS

Just when all eyes were focused on the struggles within the coalition, Labor MK Haim Ramon threw a political grenade among the opposition parties. In a radio interview yesterday morning, Ramon suggested that one of the options Labor should consider is a national unity government.

The response from his party colleagues was not long in coming: Ramon soon found himself in the Knesset cafeteria surrounded by Labor and Meretz MKs all criticizing him.

Labor's Yossi Beilin hastily convened a press conference attended by seven colleagues at which the idea of a national unity government was rejected in no uncertain terms. Perhaps the most succinct was Dalia Itzik, who stated: "A national unity government? Nyet!"

Many of the MKs were particularly surprised by Ramon's statement, since he is behind the bill for the dissolution of the Knesset and early elections.

Ramon remained unfazed by the criticism, denying he had said anything new and insisting his position remains that there are two ways to influence the peace process: early elections or a national unity government.

"I have always said that if [Prime Minister Binyamin] Netanyahu approaches the Labor Party with a serious proposal, including changing the composition of the government, we should support it. If it doesn't happen, we should dissolve the Knesset and have elections. I don't know an opposition in the world which provides a safety net for the government. If the opposition decides it agrees with the government, it joins it, and if it doesn't agree, it topples it. Preserving a government you don't agree with from outside is a new phenomenon."

He said he had spoken with Labor Party leader Ehud Barak, "as I do every day," Barak's stand is that a national unity government is not on the agenda. Former leader Shimon Peres favors it.

At the press conference, Beilin said that a national unity government under Netanyahu would not be able to reach the stage of the final-status arrangements with the Palestinians.

NRP urged PM to cancel speech

By LIAT COLLINS

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has canceled the speech he was to deliver at the National Religious Party central committee next Thursday. The official reason given is a tight schedule.

Apparently the request that he not appear came from the NRP itself, which does not want the premier at a meeting in which it will decide on its candidate for prime minister. It also took into account that its ministers and MKs will probably have voted against the Wye Memorandum in the cabinet and Knesset earlier in the week, making a speech by Netanyahu on reasons to support it redundant.

"He called and asked us to come, along with [Defense Minister Ariel] Sharon," said NRP MK Nissan Slomiansky. "We warned him that tempers were hot and the reception might be very difficult... so he seems to have changed his mind."

An NRP source admitted the party is concerned that the prime minister would be seriously heckled at the meeting and would not be able to speak.

Meanwhile, Labor Party Secretary-General Ra'anana Cohen yesterday met with NRP MKs Zvi Hendel, Shmaryahu Ben-Tsur, Slomiansky, and Eli Gabbai. It was decided to strengthen the contact between the two parties and next week MKs from both factions are expected to meet in the Knesset.

"These meetings are the start of a move to bring us closer and renew the historic alliance between Labor and the NRP," Cohen said.

He said the two parties have enough in common on socio-economic issues to cooperate, despite the differences on the diplomatic process.

"These meetings are important for creating a dialogue between the parties," Cohen said. Slomiansky said the NRP is at a crossroads. He said the main task is to reduce the divisions in the country. He also said that Labor Party leader Ehud Barak is an option as a candidate for prime minister as far as he is concerned. Danna Harman contributed to this report.

Budget vote postponed

By NINA GILBERT

The vote on the first reading of the 1999 state budget and economic arrangements bill was postponed yesterday when it was decided to turn it into a vote of no-confidence in the government, after it became apparent that the government did not have a majority to pass the legislation.

The no-confidence vote is due to take place on Monday. Moledet MK Rehavam Ze'evi, who proposed the motion, demanded that the vote take place on Sunday, after the memorial session marking the third anniversary of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

Ze'evi, whose proposal caused an uproar in the plenum, claimed that Knesset rules require that no-confidence motions be heard at the first session of the week.

However, Speaker Dan Tichon's office scoffed at the suggestion, noting that the Rabin session is a special gathering of the plenum and thus is not considered the first session of the week.

The debate on the first reading of the budget continued for a second day yesterday and was due to end with a vote.

Finance Minister Yaakov Neeman concluded the debate by asking the MKs not to use the budget vote to demonstrate opposition to the peace process.

However, minutes before the vote was to take place, coalition whip Meir Sheerit rushed into consultations with Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, as it had become apparent there was no majority. This was due to the lack of support from the National Religious Party, which said its budget demands were not met.

When the House came to order again, Ze'evi proposed turning the vote into a no-confidence motion. His proposal was followed by a motion from Sheerit to make the vote a motion of confidence in the prime minister.

Labor whip Elie Goldschmidt decried Sheerit's proposal. Goldschmidt said his party could not support turning the vote into a motion of confidence in the prime minister as this "would force it to vote against its conscience on the budget."

He said Labor had a gentlemen's agreement with the government to support it for two weeks on the peace process and in votes of no-confidence, but this did not include other issues, such as the budget.

As a result of Goldschmidt's plea, Sheerit withdrew his confidence proposal, which would have resulted in an immediate vote. Ze'evi's proposal remained, however.

Labor faction leaders said they would ensure there are enough votes to reject the budget bill but not topple the government, which requires a majority of 61 MKs, on Monday.

Goldschmidt said that the Labor Party would be considering again next week whether to extend the security net. In the meantime, he said he would try to persuade Ze'evi to rescind his no-confidence motion in order to have a vote only on the budget.

The National Religious Party said that it wouldn't support the budget and would vote no-confidence unless the Treasury meets its demands, including granting free education beginning at four and repealing the plan to cut benefits for senior citizens.

After the Knesset session, Neeman accused the NRP of using the budget to vent its anger at the government over the Wye agreement, a claim rejected by the NRP, which said it is not linking the two issues. The NRP is to meet next Thursday to decide on its political path, including the early elections bill. It is not expected to support any move to topple the prime minister.

US planning int'l parley to raise funds for PA

By HILLEL KUTTLER

WASHINGTON - The US intends to organize an international conference to raise funds for Palestinian economic development projects that it hopes will demonstrate tangible support for last week's Israeli-Palestinian accord.

The effort comes as the administration, using blunt language, is raising its pressure on the Arab world to cease viewing the peace process as a "spectator sport" and take steps to support the Wye Memorandum.

Such moves would include a resumption of the annual regional economic conference that was cancelled this year, and of the long-frozen multilateral negotiations, and normalizing relations with Israel.

Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Martin Indyk told Israeli and Arab reporters late Tuesday that the US wants tangible steps in support of Israel and the Palestinians to occur now, rather than wait the end of the three-month implementation period.

While 12 weeks "may seem a very short time," it will be "a very long time politically for [Palestinian Authority] Chairman [Yasser] Arafat and Prime Minister [Binyamin] Netanyahu," he said. "They are going to be facing... strong opposition as implementation goes forward. They are going to need support. We are not asking for the moon."

Arab states that for the past year prodded the US to break the deadlock in the peace process now have an obligation to support the agreement, much as the administration is working with Congress to provide funds to help cover redeployment costs and investments in the Palestinian economy, Indyk said.

He called the Arabs' response to the accord "lukewarm."

He added that the US is appealing also to the EU, Russia, and others to play a role.

"They should decide. If they have an interest in peace, they've got to decide: Are they going to sit back and allow the US to do all the heavy lifting on its own, or are they going to lend a hand? If they're going to sit back... then they have to suspend their criticism."

"If they have an interest in peace, then they need to act according to that interest... We have never accepted the proposition that we should have a greater interest in this than the parties themselves."

The US organized a donors conference here on October 1, 1993, just three weeks after the signing of the Oslo 1 accord. The event raised more than $2 billion for Palestinian infrastructure projects, although pledges were slow being fulfilled as the newly formed PA sought to institutionalize the required accounting procedures.

The US now believes that donor countries should now have "a high degree of confidence" that their pledges "will be put to good effect," Indyk said.

Several donors have told the US that they are troubled by the effect on the Palestinian economy of Israel's security closures of the territories, Indyk said. But he added that if the implementation of the accord proceeds faithfully, those concerns will lessen.

Asked about Saudi Arabia's role, Indyk said that its pressing the US to play a more active role in brokering the redeployment agreement, as well as its support for the Palestinians, constitute "another reason why we think it's reasonable to expect Saudi Arabia and others to be responsive now to our call for their stronger engagement in the process."

PA court sentences officers for Fatah raid

By STEVE RODAN and MOHAMMED NAJIB

Thousands of Fatah activists and supporters called yesterday at the funeral of Wasim Tarifi, 18, shot dead by a Palestinian security officer, for an end to what they termed the tyranny of PA security forces.

The funeral took place hours after a Jericho court sentenced four members of the PA's military intelligence service to terms of up to four years for their raid on a Fatah officer, on Saturday, which led to the shootout at a violent demonstration the following day.

In an unprecedented show of defiance, thousands of people, led by PA officials and legislators, marched past Ramallah police headquarters and chanted slogans against Moussa Arafat, head of military intelligence and the nephew of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

"Moussa, Moussa, you coward. Go chase women," young demonstrators chanted, as PA officials tried to gain control of their bullhorn. "Revolt against corruption. First in line is Moussa Arafat." PA representatives warned Chairman Arafat that the Palestinians would no longer be intimidated by the security forces.

"The Palestinian people is unable to remain silent against this force," PA parliamentary affairs minister Nabil Azm said. "The PA will not remain for long if it doesn't eliminate its corruption."

PA Civil Affairs Minister Jamil Tarifi, the uncle of the dead teenager, directed his anger toward Moussa Arafat. He called on the PA chairman to deal harshly with his nephew.

"If this [Moussa Arafat] is from the Palestinian people, he knows that he must not enter this city [Ramallah] as he was the cause of these incidents."

The Jericho court sentenced the officers for endangering the interests of the Palestinian people and harming national unity. Lt. Mahmoud Haroun was sentenced to four years. Sgt. Mahmoud Walid, Sgt. Alaeddin Nabulsi, and Pvt. Faisal Ali were sentenced to three years each.

At a news conference in Gaza, military intelligence chief Arafat acknowledged that he ordered the raid of the Fatah office in Ramallah on Saturday. He said the raid was meant to capture seven Fatah activists whom he suspected of assaulting colleagues.

"Here, I confess that I made a mistake," Arafat said referring to the raid. "After some phone calls, we released the prisoners in the early hours of the morning. But we were surprised on Sunday by an armed [Fatah] demonstration and assault on a shop and shooting in the air by a person with a weapon. One citizen [Tarifi] was wounded. He hasn't any connection with Fatah. I am sad over his death and I am sending my condolences to his family."

Arafat said his officers did not shoot Tarifi, as they were behind a high stone wall that blocked their view of the demonstrators. He pointed out that several Fatah demonstrators shot their rifles and said he has obtained a list of the armed protesters.

Dozens arrested as student clashes with police intensify

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN and ELLI WOHLGELERNTER

Clashes between students and police intensified yesterday as protests were held in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Beersheba and Haifa. Six students were injured, and at least 76 arrested, according to Ronen Herszkowitz, chairman of the National Union of Israeli Students.

Police officials said last night that as of today, they would use tougher measures against student protesters, Israel Radio reported.

The arrests in Tel Aviv came after students blocked Einstein Street outside Tel Aviv University and later during a large demonstration at the Gilo Junction. At the university, students burned tires.

Protesters in cars staged a "funeral" on the Ayalon Highway and other roads, snarling traffic.

Herszkowitz said that police once again entered the campus and made arrests at the union headquarters, even though they had promised Knesset Interior Committee chairman Micha Goldman not to do so. Itim reported that two students were hurt when a policeman hit them with a megaphone.

"Things are getting hotter, and we've again seen the tough tactics being used against the students by the police," Herszkowitz said. Meanwhile, no one is paying attention to us and we have heard nothing from the Treasury or the Education Ministry."

"How many students must be injured or arrested before the Finance Minister hears us?" he asked. "We want him to know that we haven't given up and aren't breaking." Police said they arrested only students inciting others from the roof.

In downtown Jerusalem, seven protesting students were arrested when they tried to block traffic on Jaffa Road. Some 300 students took part in the demonstration, which was held without a permit.

After gathering on Ben-Yehuda Street, the students sat down in the center of Zion Square, chanting slogans and waving protest signs. An agreement was reached among Jerusalem District Police Cmdr. Yair Yitzhaki, MK Naomi Chazan and student leaders whereby the students agreed to return to campus in exchange for the release of the seven students.

There were also two students arrested in Haifa and one hurt after students blocked Merkaz Horev near the Technion, some carrying a coffin marked "higher education." Demonstrations were also held at Bar Ilan University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, where eight people were arrested.

Twenty-three more students were arrested during another rally held last night at the Gilo Junction.

Meanwhile, the Knesset Finance and Education committees demanded that the Finance Ministry present proposals by next week for helping the students to reduce their tuition load. "I will not be able to face the public pressure if we don't bring the students a real answer from the Treasury," Finance Committee Chairman Avraham Ravitz said.

Education Committee Chairman MK Emanuel Zissmann proposed that the joint committee be charged with advancing the negotiations between the two sides "but not based on the unreasonable stand taken by the Treasury that an agreement was signed for five years, and now there's nothing that can be done."

The Union of Local Authorities in Israel pledged NIS 50,000 in financial support to gain the release of arrested students, but because the banks were closed yesterday afternoon, many of those arrested were facing a night in jail. Politicians and other public figures were involved in trying to gain releases.

The ULAI also demanded an investigation into the arrests made in the union building.

MKs use immunity to work on Ras el-Amud

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER

Three MKs started erecting a fence at the controversial Jerusalem property in Ras el-Amud yesterday, using their parliamentary immunity to succeed where others had been stopped by police twice before this week.

"It's unfortunate that we have to rely on our parliamentary immunity to do what legally is allowed to every Jew," said Michael Kleiner, head of the Land of Israel Front. "As we were informed that nobody could help us, we MKs will start building the fence today, and if we can't complete it, we will come back next week to complete the work."

Beny Elon (Moleket) said they were forced to start the work because "we received information that there was some kind of agreement at the Wye Plantation that this area, between Abu Dis and the Temple Mount, is the most strategic and important area for the PLO."

Rolling up their sleeves and donning workman's gloves, Kleiner, Elon, and Nissan Slomiansky (National Religious Party) hoisted a three-meter-high fence post and together started banging down on it. After two unsuccessful attempts, they moved the stake and succeeded in getting it far enough into the ground to stand on its own.

Elon then held a roll of barbed wire, while Slomiansky unraveled it southward for about 15 meters along the western edge of the compound.

The MKs defended their right to build - on behalf of owner Dr. Irving Moskowitz - because they were in possession of all necessary documents.

"I spoke before I came here with the minister of internal security," said Kleiner, "and he said he has no answers because legally we are right and the law doesn't give the police any right to interfere." Sources said that police permission is likely to come at week's end, at which point building on the property will continue.

Kleiner also said that the garage abutting the house, where six students and two families now live, will be converted into the Land of Israel Front headquarters.

There were no Palestinian or Peace Now demonstrators, as police cordoned off the area.

"What the MKs did today was a show of strength for [Prime Minister Binyamin] Netanyahu," said Hagit Yaari, spokeswoman for Peace Now, who was prevented from entering the area. "The right-wing MKs are trying to do everything possible to stop this peace process. We demand that Netanyahu stop these provocative actions."

Kindness that endured for half a century

An Israeli woman tracks down an ex-British soldier who helped her while interned in Cyprus

By SHI DAVID

Fifty-one years ago, when Cpl. Albert Hampson and two other British soldiers gave a lonely seven-year-old girl at the Cyprus Transit Camp fruit, chocolate, and milk against army regulations, he had no idea how important it was to the young refugee from Romania.

"I couldn't believe how much it meant to her until we met," said Hampson, 70, who arrived a week ago and met Miriam Axelrod last Thursday for the first time since 1947. "I thought to myself: This is a dream come true."

"You can't understand how much the gesture they made means to a little kid who has nothing," said Axelrod, 58. "It was hard. I was the only child [in the camp] with no toys, by myself, and Albert was one of three soldiers who gave me something every day."

Today a businesswoman from Ramat Gan, in 1947 Axelrod, her mother, and grandmother were among illegal refugees captured by the British navy en route to Haifa. She began her search for Hampson and his comrades seven years ago, but without their names or other details. While in London in 1991, she sent letters telling her story to the five biggest daily newspapers in England and made appearances on missing-person TV programs.

Hampson didn't answer, but a man named John Smith did. He assembled a team and began searching army and veterans' organizations archives. About a month and a half ago, Hampson was found; he and Axelrod exchanged letters, spoke on the phone, and a trip to Israel was arranged.

"The first time we spoke on the phone I was so nervous that I

Miriam Axelrod with former British soldier Albert Hampson, whom she met at her refugee camp in Cyprus in 1947. The two were reunited after Axelrod searched seven years to find Hampson. (Yael Somekh/Israel Sun) couldn't speak in English and spoke only Hebrew to him," recalled Axelrod. "Finally I gave my husband the phone and told him to say that I'd phone again tomorrow. I was able to talk then and we talked a lot and he said that he would come in the last week of October."

"She was very, very nervous and I wasn't very steady myself," said

Hampson, a retiree. "My wife and I had plans to go to Cyprus or Italy, but after talking on the phone, we decided to come here." When he arrived, "we jumped on each other right away and kissed as if we've known each other all our lives," said Axelrod. The two have been sharing memories of the camp. Axelrod has told Hampson how she, her mother, and grandmother would share what he gave her with others in the camp. Hampson told Axelrod that she had reminded him of his little sister back home. Hampson said he and his wife, Patricia, have been "thoroughly spoiled by Miriam and Tony [her husband]," and that "the Israeli people have been marvelous to us, absolutely wonderful."

The Hampsons are returning to Wiltshire, England today, but plans are under way for the Axelrods to visit. Axelrod also plans to continue searching for the surviving soldier from the camp trio. "I owe them a huge debt," said Axelrod. "I am disappointed the third is gone, because I wanted to give my gratitude to all three."

JNF finds map with plans for arson

By DAVID RUDGE

A detailed plan for a campaign of arson attacks against forests in the Mt. Gilboa region was discovered by JNF workers after they tackled a blaze in the area on Tuesday evening.

The piece of paper giving details of the plan and a map of the region were found in a wallet which had apparently fallen from the pocket of a man who, with several others, was seen running away from the scene.

JNF spokesman Moshe Pearl said it appeared from documents found in the wallet that the man is a resident of Jilaboun, just over the Green Line. He said the documents were given to the police.

"On Tuesday evening, a team of JNF foresters on fire-watch duty on Mt. Gilboa spotted smoke and raced to the scene of a blaze that had broken out. They saw a number of people running away," said Pearl.

"After they extinguished the fire, they found the wallet with the map and the plans for the arson campaign inside it. The site where the blaze occurred was one of those listed on the plan."

Pearl noted that the JNF had boosted fire-watch patrols and observation posts following dozens of fires which had destroyed hundreds of dunams of forest and natural brush in the Mt. Gilboa area in the past few weeks.

He said the action had paid dividends on Tuesday evening and that the team on duty at the time had spotted the fire managed to extinguish it quickly.

"We also now have an indication that the previous fires were not accidental, nor the result of negligence, as well as a clue as to who was behind them," said Pearl.

Human error caused deaths in APC crash

By DAVID RUDGE

Human error appears to have been the cause of the accident in which IDF paratroopers Sgt. Omer Eshed and Sgt. Eran Ariel were killed when their armored personnel carrier plunged down a cliff in the Wadi Litani area of south Lebanon last month.

The findings of an inquiry conducted by Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz into the accident revealed that the soldiers had been properly prepared for their mission and the vehicles had also been properly equipped.

The driver of the APC was highly qualified and experienced in carrying out such missions. The inquiry found that soldiers nearby saw the APC moving towards the cliff and called on the crew to stop, but for reasons that were unclear, the APC did not come to a halt and plunged 300 meters over the precipice.

Mofaz, who described the incident as a "painful operational accident," concluded that it was impossible to absolutely determine the cause. The Chief of Staff gave instructions to carry out improvements in certain operational aspects connected to the incident.

Mofaz conducted a separate inquiry into an incident last month in which an officer trainee was shot in the leg and moderately wounded during an exercise prior to an ambush mission in the security zone.

Mofaz said it was a "serious incident" resulting from an unacceptably low level of safety precautions. Mofaz accepted the recommendations of the head of Ground Forces Command to make a note in the record of the battalion commander of the officer's training base. The cadet officer's company commander was reprimanded.

PLAN

"With respect to the idea that is now out there that this agreement is in jeopardy - we do not agree with that," Rubin told reporters. "As a result of those conversations, we believe that this agreement will go forward. On the Palestinian side, we have been assured that what needs to be done in the coming days will be done. And on the Israeli side... [Albright] has confidence that Prime Minister Netanyahu will get the necessary approvals of his government in the coming days."

While the agreement states that the Palestinians' security plan will be presented to the US by November 2, when the accord takes effect, "there was an understanding that the necessary work would be done by Friday," Rubin said.

LIKUD

He, too, listed the accomplishments he said were achieved at Wye and went on to charge that "our political rivals want to bring this government down, not in order to win more for Israel but to yield more to the Arabs."

Mordechai described the "relentless battles by the prime minister and the team for every clause and detail. It was a brave battle to fix what was wrong with Oslo... Eretz Yisrael is holy to us all, as is our history and heritage, but we must pay heed to today's reality."

Begin said to Netanyahu, Mordechai, and Sharon: "Arafat has wrapped you around his little finger," adding that Netanyahu is "Arafat's friend."

"You say [rejecting the agreement] will bring the Left to power? The Left is already in power. Two left hands signed the agreement and turned the Likud into a contractor of the Labor Party," Begin said.

"Netanyahu is lying once again. In fact, he has transferred 27%, 800 square kilometers of Judea and Samaria, to the Palestinians. Israel now depends on the good will of the Palestinians. If they want to, they'll cooperate, if not they'll give a green light to terrorism and terrorists will emerge from the mountains which this government is giving them," Begin said.

Begin's angry speech, which many took to be a sign he had decided to quit the Likud, was scheduled towards the end of the meeting, after the Channel 1 Mabot news, and was made after many had already left the auditorium.

Liat Collins adds:

A spokesman for Barak responded to Netanyahu's speech saying the prime minister "lied as usual to save his seat."

"Barak never demanded the US initiative be accepted as it was. On the contrary, Barak warned that Netanyahu would give in to the US as indeed happened. Barak would have achieved a better agreement earlier and will achieve a better final-status arrangement," the spokesman said.

"Leaders do not lead by whining and crying. Netanyahu would do better to start acting calmly as his job requires and not pulling the wool over the eyes of his voters having lied to them."

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid said: "Netanyahu has for the last few days played the role of the victim of incitement, but [at the party conference] he showed for the umpteenth time that he is the national inciter."

Tichon: More MKs threatened

Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon yesterday again warned of increased threats against MKs. "This is a democracy and decisions should be made in the polling booth and accepted," he said, calling on MKs to act with greater tolerance and to consider their words carefully.

Some MKs have received individual protection, he added, but said this is not enough. He did not elaborate.

"We can't make the whole area sterile, but we do our best," he said.

Tichon noted there is an ongoing dispute over whether the police or the General Security Service is responsible for protecting MKs.

On Sunday the Knesset will hold a short special memorial session for Yitzhak Rabin, after a graveside ceremony. The prime minister, leader of the opposition, and four other MKs will speak, he said.

The Rabin family is to attend, as are the president, the state comptroller, president of the Supreme Court, chief rabbis, and other dignitaries.

Law for soldiers' medical treatment

The Knesset this week passed a law that provides soldiers who are found physically unfit for service a 60-day period in which they can receive medical treatment while remaining in the military. The law was the initiative of Labor MK Ori Orr, a reserve major-general.

He said that previously a soldier found unfit on medical grounds was immediately demobilized, even if the problem was only temporary. This created a feeling of rejection among many soldiers and their families. The new law gives the soldiers the status of volunteers for the two-month period.

Cemeteries first

MK Micha Goldman (Labor), chairman of the Knesset Interior Committee, yesterday demanded that ministries not approve plans for new communities unless a local cemetery has been budgeted for.

Rabbi Yitzhak Yaacobovitz, rabbi of the South Sharon Council, told the committee that, in some communities lacking a cemetery, such as Tzur Yigal, "The dead are held in mortuary freezers for a long time until a solution can be found concerning where they can be buried."

Police to act against election plasterers

Police Insp.-Gen. Yehuda Wilk has promised MK Avraham Poraz (Shinui) that the police is prepared to deal with the illegal plastering of electoral campaign material.

Poraz said that election slogans had been posted on electricity pylons and even from the wires. He said the problem has become widespread, because offenders do not believe they will be caught and prosecuted. He also called for deterrent fines.

Let youth visit Jordan

The Knesset Education Committee this week demanded that regulations regarding school trips abroad be changed to enable youth to visit Jordan.

Under the current regulations, all official delegations must be accompanied by General Security Service guards. Since the Jordanians do not allow armed GSS members into the country, the GSS will not approve the trips. School trips to Poland are accompanied by armed Israeli guards under an agreement with the Polish government.

The committee said it will meet with the GSS to try to solve the problem before the Hanukka vacation.

Swiss to issue gold report

BERN (AP) — The Swiss government said yesterday it will issue an easily readable summary of a report on the country's gold dealings with Nazi Germany to bring the study to "the widest cross-section of the population."

Meanwhile, in Vienna, the Austrian Evangelical Church acknowledged its role in the "suffering of Jews" through Austrian history and admitted it shared responsibility for the Holocaust.

The Swiss cabinet said in a statement: "Reappraisal of Switzerland's history during the World War II era should not be left to a small circle of experts."

The 200-page study by an independent panel of historians, released in May, said the Swiss National Bank, the country's central bank, bought 1.2 billion Swiss francs (then $284 million) worth of gold from Germany during the war. That is about three-quarters of all the gold shipped by wartime Germany.

It also said that the bank received 119.5 kgs of gold melted down from the possessions of concentration camp victims. But the historians said they had no evidence the bank knew the source of that gold.

Surrounded by Germany and Nazi allies, neutral Switzerland needed increasing amounts of gold in the face of demand for the franc, the only internationally acceptable currency on the European continent.

Swiss authorities will be responsible for distributing the brochure, which will be printed in Switzerland's four official languages as well as in English.

In Austria, a statement adopted by the Evangelical Church said that "with shame we declare that our church showed insensitivity for the fate of the Jews and uncounted others who were persecuted."

The church said such conduct during the Nazi era was particularly shameful because Protestants themselves had been victims of oppression during the Counter Reformation.

Yet the church as an institution turned its back on the murder of 6 million European Jews, including Austrian citizens, before the defeat of the Nazis in 1945.

Unity Covenant binds North American Jews, Israelis

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN

A Unity Covenant calling for mutual commitment and strengthening of ties between North American Jewry and Israel was signed yesterday in the Knesset by Speaker Dan Tichon, MKs, and leaders of the United Jewish Federation in Israel.

The event was the first of many taking place as part of the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, which is taking place here for the first time, from November 16-19.

Despite the overall spirit of unity, there was still some minor disagreement, with Tichon and other MKs pointing out the lack of adequate mention of Jerusalem and Zionism in the covenant.

Discussions are under way about adding the line, "For the sake of Zion, I will not be silent," and possibly other items.

The covenant calls on Israeli and North American Jews to "rededicate ourselves to the spiritual and historic centrality of the State of Israel and to one another," but also speaks of "the building of dynamic Jewish communities that span the seas."

It also calls for "strengthening the links between us by creating personal relationships and active involvements that will serve to draw us closer to one another."

It speaks of "a common vision of caring for each other" and of "reaching out to Jews wherever they are and strengthening their connection to the Jewish people." It calls on both communities to dedicate themselves "to the ideals of Jewish unity and mutual respect; and of supporting those principles that have sustained our identity from the giving of the Torah until today."

Jewish Agency Chairman Avraham Burg hailed the signing, saying: "At a time of internal divisiveness among the Jewish people, and the increasing isolation of both Jews in Israel and those in the Diaspora communities, I view the signing of this covenant as a milestone in the relations between the Jews of North America and Israel."

Menachem Revivi, head of the United Jewish Federation in Israel, said that "all corners of the Knesset gathered around the covenant reaffirming the commitment toward a new relationship between Israel and North American Jews."

The covenant was created by North American Jewish leaders and the major political parties represented in the Knesset, according to a UJA Federations of North America spokesman. It will be signed by MKs, Israeli mayors, and leaders of the North American Jewish community during the General Assembly.

Israelis and Jews from around the world are invited to sign it at the GA web site, www.ga98.org.

West Bank waste polluting Nahal Alexander

Wastewater from olive presses in Nablus and Tulkarm is causing serious pollution to Nahal Alexander, resulting in the deaths of a large number of fish, according to the Environment Ministry. Much of the damage is in a section recently rehabilitated in a multi-million shekel project and includes the area where water turtles lay their eggs.

Ministry Director-General Nehama Ronen said attempts to reach an agreement with the Palestinian Authority on the organized removal of the wastewater have failed, even though the ministry offered to fund it. Ronen said she intends taking the matter up at the highest levels.

Pimp gets 36 months for 'selling' woman

Navizyon Azimazinov was sentenced by the Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court yesterday to two-and-a-half years in prison for smuggling a Tashkent woman into the country and selling her into prostitution.

An accomplice, Shlomo Briner, was given a suspended sentence of 15 months and fined NIS 15,000 for fraud and forgery associated with marrying the woman fictitiously in order to bring her to here. Azimazinov, of Bnei Brak, sold the woman for $5,000 to the Fantasia Institute of Beersheba, which demanded she repay them NIS 100,000 before she could work for herself. She eventually did and returned to Tashkent, but then came back to Israel to work for Azimazinov again, until filing a complaint against him for withholding wages.

Late night planes grounded

As of tomorrow, planes will no longer take off from Ben-Gurion Airport between 2 a.m. and 5:30 a.m. In announcing the new regulations, Transportation Minister Shaul Yahalom said that the noise of planes taking off in the wee hours was disturbing to area residents. Yahalom said that limiting take-offs to more reasonable hours would reduce noise pollution and improve the quality of life.

The respite, however, will be brief. The new rules will not apply in 2000 so as not to interfere with the anticipated boom of incoming tourism said Yahalom.

Upgrading ties

Mauritanian Foreign Minister Sheikh el-Afia Wil'd Mohammed Khouna is welcomed to Jerusalem yesterday by Foreign Ministry Director-General Eytan Bentsur. Khouna met later with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to express the support of his country, a member of the Arab League, for the Wye accord. The visit is seen by Israel as indicating a possible thaw in relations with the Arab world.

Tender issued for Jerusalem master plan

By AMY KLEIN

A public tender for preparing a new Jerusalem master plan has been published by the Interior Ministry's planning bureau, the Israel Lands Authority and the Ministry of Housing.

"The Interior Minister sees this plan as the way to develop Jerusalem in an agreed manner for the year 2020," said a statement by the ministry spokesman's office.

Proposals can be submitted until December 17.

A planning committee will have two years to review the plan and ensure its approval in various committees.

Jerusalem has been without a master plan since 1959. Thus there is no blueprint including east Jerusalem, which was under Jordanian rule until 1967.

A spokeswoman from the Jerusalem municipality said it will collaborate on the new plan "at some stage." It is unclear how the plan will affect building permits and other projects which have already been approved, she said.

Arabs must face the results of Wye

Now that the peace process is moving forward again, how will the Arab states respond?

Last year's Arab League meeting urged its members to freeze normalization of relations with Israel. With Israel-Palestinian negotiations thawed, this policy should also be reconsidered.

Arab regimes, particularly given the theatrics around the Wye Plantation meeting, were caught off guard by its success.

They weren't the only ones surprised. While on a lecture tour in England for the BESA Center for Strategic Studies as the Wye talks went on, colleagues and I constantly reiterated our belief that the two sides would reach an agreement. We were ridiculed for being too optimistic by a wide range of experts, journalists, and visitors from other Middle East countries.

Two years ago, I had precisely the same experience in Canada, where I was just before the Hebron Accord was reached. Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, we were told, was incapable of making a deal. And anyway, hadn't we heard that the peace process was dead?

In light of such attitudes, one cannot repeat too often the most important single point to be made about the Israel-Palestinian peace process: Nobody is walking away from it.

Despite 21 months without progress (between the January 1997 Hebron Agreement and this month's Wye Memorandum) neither side abandoned the negotiating framework established by the Oslo Accords.

This is true because both sides need this process. Nobody has any attractive alternative. Moreover, whoever quits first would be blamed for the process's failure, and any subsequent violence.

If Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat abandoned the accords, he would lose all the gains made by Palestinians in the last five years. He would also be admitting the failure of his strategy, which would destroy his credibility and probably mean the end of his leadership. Indeed, if a real confrontation ensued, it could easily end with Arafat and the entire PA hierarchy having to flee the territories.

Similarly, if Netanyahu were to give up it would be an admission that he could not provide peace with security. He would probably need to begin scanning the newspapers for want ads for furniture salesmen, as his reelection prospects would be very dim.

Israel's foreign relations, especially with the US would sink to a new low, too.

The Arab states, however, don't necessarily subscribe to this analysis.

Of course, anything having to do with the CIA makes Arab regimes nervous. And in Cairo it was certainly noticed with some irritation that Egypt – unlike Jordan – played no direct role in the negotiations.

So their first line of defense could be to say that the new agreement will not be implemented anyway and therefore they don't have to do anything different. Yet if there really are further redeployments by Israel, does this mean that the freeze will also be lifted? There was, after all, some progress on this front after the Hebron Agreement was signed.

Israel is wasting no time in checking out the situation's possibilities. On a bilateral level, it will explore whether any of a half-dozen Arab states are ready to start moving again on improving relations, discussing trade deals, and other such issues.

The US has also been asked to help encourage Arab countries, especially Saudi Arabia, to ease relations. After all, showing Israel that concessions to the Palestinians yield some "fruits of peace" is a great way to encourage more compromises in the future.

THE CLINTON administration, however, never quite seems to understand this point, or at least doesn't want to exert much energy in that direction. Using American leverage to push Arab states toward a rapprochement with Israel is a lower priority than, for example, trying to get them to support US efforts to maintain the sanctions on Iraq.

King Hussein's noble effort to help break impasses in the Wye negotiations is a sign that Israeli-Jordanian relations will be further strengthened. One of the few bright spots his new subordinates can find in the appointment of Ariel Sharon as foreign minister is that he is committed to working hard on this issue.

It's intriguing that Sharon, previously the main promoter of the idea to turn Jordan into a PLO-ruled state rather than give up the territories, has now become that country's advocate in the Netanyahu government.

Ironically, the PA also needs some help in obtaining some "fruits of peace."

May 4, 1999 is a date usually cited in connection with Arafat's notice of his intention to declare an independent state. But it will also mark the end of the commitment by several dozen countries to fund the PA.

And even though the US is planning a new donors' conference to raise money, it should be recalled that the amount of money pledged by all Arab states and institutions during the first five years of the process was less than that pledged by Norway alone.

For the time being, Arab regimes will wait until implementation of the Wye agreement actually begins. But they had better start thinking about what they will do if Israel delivers on its promises.

'I want justice, not revenge,' says Allende's daughter

By PHILIP DELVES BROUGHTON

SANTIAGO, Chile – The arrest of Gen. Augusto Pinochet in England has given immense satisfaction to the daughter of the man he ousted as president of Chile.

Isabel Allende was 28 on September 11, 1973, when her father, Salvador Allende, died – reportedly by his own hand – as military forces led by Pinochet seized La Moneda, the seat of government in Santiago.

For socialists around the world, Allende became a martyr. For his opponents, he represented a political and economic sickness for which Pinochet was the cure.

After 15 years in exile in Mexico, Isabel Allende returned to Chile in 1988. Like her father, she, too, has become a symbol – for all those who suffered during the Pinochet years. For the past five years, she has served as a Socialist Party deputy in congress.

In the past few days, she has been a leading advocate for Pinochet's arrest and trial.

"We were very happy to hear about his arrest," said Allende, speaking on behalf of her family and supporters. "His victims have been so humiliated for so long. This gives us all a lot of hope."

Last month, she attended the Labor Party conference in Blackpool, where she met Prime Minister Tony Blair.

"He told me he thought my father was a hero – a great man," she said.

Her meeting with Blair provided ammunition for Pinochet's supporters, who believe the arrest is politically motivated.

"That is nonsense," she said. "I did not know when I went to Britain that Pinochet was going to be arrested."

ALLENDE, an intense, elegant woman, lives in the home in which she grew up and where her family lived until her father was elected president in 1970.

On the day of the coup, her family, including her father, were offered a flight out of Chile by Pinochet. But they feared they would be pushed out of the aircraft as it flew – a favorite trick of the secret police.

Many in Chile assumed that Salvador Allende did not take his life but was killed by Pinochet's forces. His daughter does not believe that.

"My father killed himself because he could not face the humiliation," she said. "He stayed in La Moneda until the last minute and became a symbol of resistance, hope and dignity."

The Allendes took refuge in the Mexican Embassy and then went into exile. In 1988, when Pinochet began Chile's transition to democracy, Miss Allende returned.

"For 25 years, it has not been possible to see Pinochet punished for what he did," she said. "For all these years, he was insensitive to the families of the murdered and the disappeared."

"When we talked about human rights, he said, 'What are they?' When we found several sets of remains in one grave at the general cemetery, he said, 'That's an economy.' For all those people who have suffered a lot, it is important to see justice."

She has little time for those on the political Right who argue that Pinochet's arrest threatens Chile's democracy.

"I understand that there is more tension, more polarization, in Chile," she said. "But we have to accept that this is a judicial matter, and I respect the fairness and autonomy of the British judicial system... If the Right continues to say that violence will come, I tell them they will be responsible for it if it does come."

MISS Allende's brand of socialism is very different from that practiced by her father. Under Salvador Allende, congress was virtually bypassed, as a massive program of nationalization and income redistribution was implemented through the courts.

Allende's socialist dream became a nightmare for most Chileans as hyper-inflation and serious shortages crippled the country.

On her visit to Blackpool, she picked up the works of Anthony Giddens, Blair's favorite political theorist, and has become impressed by the so-called Third Way.

"I believe in giving people the tools to become integrated in society through education and health, creating autonomous people," she said.

She is not wholly dismissive of Pinochet's achievement in building up Chile from the rubble of 1973 into an economic and social model for the rest of South America. But she dispenses the notion that Pinochet's crimes were a necessary evil.

"Was it really necessary to have state terrorism in order to restructure the economy? I would have preferred to have done it perhaps more slowly, through political parties, with trade unions, with human rights respected."

Miss Allende says it is important for Chile as a democracy to come to terms with the crimes of the Pinochet years.

"Most people in Chile feel no trust for the judicial system here. This is not good for our democratic future."

She believes Pinochet's arrest in Britain may go some way to helping Chile adopt a different attitude to the years of his rule. She would like to see justice – rather than denial – over the crimes of that era.

"This is not revenge. But I do not think humanitarian reasons should equal impunity. Pinochet has a right to a defense, but he must confront his past."

"I am interested in a trial – not seeing him in prison. For the first time, he must respond to these accusations and show whether he was or was not responsible."

S. African truth probe cuts De Klerk criticism

CAPE TOWN (Reuters) — Former president F.W. de Klerk yesterday won the first round of a fight to clear his name of allegations from the apartheid era, as a section on him was cut from South Africa's historic Truth Commission report.

"We have instructed our printers to excise the contemplated finding on Mr. De Klerk from the copy of the report that will be handed to the president tomorrow," Truth Commission head Archbishop Desmond Tutu said in a statement.

Armed with the decision, De Klerk's lawyers agreed to postpone a bid in the Cape Town High Court to stop publication of the report, which had said that the president knew of apartheid atrocities, but hid his knowledge.

The case to permanently erase the findings on De Klerk, who stoutly denies them, will now be heard on March 4.

"We have not removed it permanently. It is going to be contested in court. That is how strongly we feel," Tutu later told reporters. "We are willing to fight this matter quite vigorously."

Dave Steward, spokesman for De Klerk, who is due to arrive back from London today, said the former president was happy at the decisions and was confident he would also win on his day in court.

"He has achieved his primary purpose of preventing the commission of including any of its findings against him in its final report," Steward said. "He is confident... that this matter will be resolved to his full satisfaction."

Tutu said the decision to cut the findings on De Klerk had been taken reluctantly after the commission's lawyers had said they needed far more time to prepare their case.

De Klerk's affidavit to the court said not only did he find out about the apartheid atrocities long after they happened, but that he had never tried to conceal his knowledge.

"I know of no fact or consideration which would justify any of the intended findings against me," it said.

Media leaks earlier this week revealed that the ruling African National Congress (ANC) had also been castigated in the Truth and Reconciliation Commission report for killings and torture, much to the anger of the former liberation movement.

Commentators noted that as everyone seemed equally unhappy with the expected findings of the commission, it would appear to have done its work even-handedly.

De Klerk said he had not tried to conceal that former law and order minister Adrian Vlok and former police commissioner Johan van der Merwe told him of their intention to apply for amnesty for their involvement in the 1980s bombings of two offices belonging to anti-apartheid unions and church groups.

"I cannot be held morally accountable for matters which were brought to my attention long after they occurred," the affidavit said. "In view of everything I did to uncover unlawful conduct by members of the security forces and to prevent it, I am particularly offended by this absurd suggestion."

De Klerk, who renounced apartheid in 1990 and shared the 1993 Nobel Peace Prize with President Nelson Mandela, has repeatedly denied he was party to any decision to kill foes of apartheid and has not applied for amnesty from the commission, laying himself open to prosecution if the truth commission so recommends.

He said he had not been given a fair hearing, as allegations contained in the commission's report had not been put to him during his appearance before the body, and said any negative findings would seriously harm him.

"It will irreparably damage my reputation and standing as an elder statesman, internationally regarded as a champion of the peaceful resolution of intractable disputes," he said.

Established after historic 1994 all-race elections, the commission has heard over 20,000 statements from human rights victims and received more than 7,000 applications for amnesty.

Britain's Prince Andrew (left) and Argentine President Carlos Menem clasp hands on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral yesterday in London.

Menem lays Falklands wreath in Britain

LONDON (Reuters) — Argentine President Carlos Menem yesterday laid a wreath to British victims of the Falklands War and lunched with Queen Elizabeth on the first full day of a visit designed to promote reconciliation.

First, in an act which once would have been unthinkable, he paid tribute to the 252 British soldiers who died in the 1982 war over the remote South Atlantic islands.

Menem placed a wreath of blue and white flowers — the Argentine national colors — at the foot of the black marble memorial in St. Paul's Cathedral to Britain's Falklands dead.

After a simple 15-minute ceremony designed to mark a new era in relations, he shook the hand of Prince Andrew, the queen's second son. The prince served as a combat helicopter pilot in the 10-week war.

Menem, the first Argentine leader to visit London since 1960, was then driven to Buckingham Palace for a private lunch with the queen.

Later in the day, he was due to give a keynote speech on Anglo-Argentine relations.

One notable absentee at the memorial ceremony was Margaret Thatcher, the British prime minister in 1982. She was in the US on a private trip.

Menem, watched by Foreign Secretary Robin Cook and a small group of military chiefs and veterans from both sides, stood quietly to attention for most of the ceremony. As a single trumpet played "The Last Post," Menem's daughter Zulema dabbed her eyes with a handkerchief.

Britain has made clear there will be no negotiations on sovereignty over the South Atlantic islands during Menem's trip, which is also designed to boost already healthy economic ties.

Menem told a meeting of British business executives earlier yesterday that today's Argentina was very different from the one that fought Britain in 1982.

"If we see our relations with a wide scope, we can continue to strengthen them and start a constructive and imaginative search for a way to solve creatively the problems in the Malvinas Islands," he said.

Efforts to draw a line under the Falklands War, in which 750 Argentines died, partly backfired last week amid controversy over comments by Menem that were published in the Sun newspaper.

Menem voiced deep regret over the conflict but objected to the Sun's headline, "Argentina says we're sorry for Falklands." He denied apologizing for the war.

Yeltsin seen as losing day-to-day control of Russia

MOSCOW (Reuters) — Boris Yeltsin, looking more isolated than ever, underwent a second day of sanatorium treatment for exhaustion yesterday and one of his top aides said the president no longer had day-to-day control of Russia.

The Kremlin said the 67-year-old leader, who has a history of poor health and had heart bypass surgery two years ago, was still at the Barvikha medical center west of Moscow, and plans for a holiday to recuperate further had yet to be finalized.

"He's receiving the same kind of treatment you'd receive in any sanatorium," Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Yakushkin told Itar-Tass news agency. "Everything is going according to plan."

That phrase may well ring hollow to many, not least because Kremlin officials had said Yeltsin would probably leave Moscow for a holiday yesterday. Kremlin sources now say doctors have yet to decide but are toying with the idea of sending him to the balmy climes of the Russian Black Sea resort of Sochi.

While Yeltsin recovers from what doctors say is asthma — fatigue and high blood pressure — stemming from an earlier bout of bronchitis, opposition figures and allies have become more outspoken about his plight at a time of deep economic crisis.

For many, including Kremlin staff, the pre-occupation seems to be to ensure an orderly transition.

"The government is now fully responsible for the economy," Deputy Kremlin Chief of Staff Oleg Syushev said in an interview published in the daily newspaper Sevodayna.

"The most important task for the president is to turn over stable power to his successor. He no longer has the right to be distracted by day-to-day issues," he said. Yeltsin would serve out his elected term to mid-2000 overseeing constitutional reform in the world's largest country.

Russia's constitution was made to order for Yeltsin in 1993 after parliament attempted a rebellion, and guarantees the president extremely broad powers.

Although Yeltsin's grip on the executive may be slipping, he still jealously guards his control over Russia's nuclear arsenal and the so-called power ministries: defense, foreign affairs, the interior and the intelligence services.

Yevgeny Primakov, a former foreign minister and spy chief, has already amassed considerable influence since being made premier six weeks ago.

He deputized for Yeltsin at talks with the European Union in Vienna and is openly described in the Russian media as an effective vice-president.

If Yeltsin were to die in office or step down early, Primakov would stand in for three months, ahead of an election.

NATO keeps eye on Serb pullback

By TOM COHEN

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia (AP) — Having deferred airstrikes for the moment, NATO yesterday revealed plans for more spy plane flights to make sure President Slobodan Milosevic continues to withdraw forces from Kosovo and allows tens of thousands of refugees to return home.

A senior NATO general, Klaus Naumann of Germany, said the withdrawal of Serb forces was not complete, but so far it represented a "considerable step in the direction of fulfilling the demands."

With Yugoslav forces drawing back, the Western military alliance did not set any new deadlines for airstrikes after the previous one expired Tuesday.

That was a bitter disappointment to Kosovo's ethnic Albanian politicians, who had been hoping that NATO would deliver a devastating blow to the Yugoslav war machine.

"Milosevic has known all along that NATO would not be bombing, that he would be getting away with what he and his military police have been doing here in Kosovo," Muharrem Harami of the League of Democratic Kosovo said.

But by warning that the threat of attack remains, NATO hoped to guarantee the safety of ethnic Albanian refugees, who are terrified of returning home unless government troops and Serb police are held back.

It was unclear how many refugees were returning home yesterday. There "has been some movement, but at the same time the people are still apprehensive," UN refugee agency spokesman Kris Janowski said in Geneva.

Janowski said men in some areas were returning to check the condition of homes abandoned during the fighting, but it was unclear whether most felt it was safe to bring back their wives and children.

To back up its demands, NATO decided to keep more than 400 warplanes on alert. The US Navy announced at its Mediterranean headquarters in Italy that American P-3C Orion surveillance will begin regular flights over Kosovo on Sunday.

The planes can fly for 10-12 hours without refueling and will help monitor the situation day and night, regardless of the weather. The Navy said it conducted a few such flights around the time of the first NATO deadline on Oct. 17.

Mystery hangs over resignation of British politician

LONDON (Reuters) — British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government yesterday distanced itself from a cabinet minister who resigned after a bizarre incident in a London park, but left key questions about his case unanswered.

Welsh Secretary Ron Davies quit suddenly on Tuesday, saying he had embarrassed the government by becoming the innocent victim of a crime when he was attacked and robbed by a man he befriended while out for a late-night walk near his London home.

Leading government troubleshooter Jack Cunningham acknowledged in a BBC radio interview that mystery still surrounds the incident.

"Exactly what circumstances led Ron into these difficulties is not clear," he said. "It's obvious he was the victim of a crime."

Seeking to calm a torrent of newspaper speculation, Blair's spokesman told journalists there was "no evidence of any gay link or drugs link" in the incident, which he acknowledged was bizarre.

"There are no salient facts in our possession that are not in yours," he insisted, declining to give any further details of the 45-minute conversation Davies had with Blair on Tuesday morning when he offered his resignation.

"It was not a sensible way for a cabinet minister to behave," the spokesman said, pointing to

Welsh Secretary Ron Davies (Reuters)

Davies' own account of how he ended up driving through South London in his own car with three complete strangers. But he hinted that even Blair may not have been told the full story, acknowledging that the prime minister "was left asking why" Davies acted as he did.

"Ron is adamant there is nothing further to give," he added. "He said he was going to go for a meal with these people."

Cunningham, secretary of state at the Cabinet Office, described the conversation between Davies and Blair on Tuesday, at which he was not present, as "very personal, emotional and difficult."

Davies' political future in Wales continues to hang in the balance with both Cunningham and Blair's spokesman insisting this is a matter for the ex-minister himself and the Welsh Labor Party.

Asked whether Davies should give more details of what happened, Cunningham replied: "He had a pretty difficult day. It's not for me to say he should do more interviews."

Blair's spokesman said Davies "is entitled to have a day or two to take stock and talk to his family" before addressing the issue.

Tabloid newspapers were in no doubt that Davies was involved in a homosexual scandal, noting that the area was a favorite place for gay men to meet after dark.

Revolt in Congo had multi-ethnic genesis

Ethnic tensions within the Congolese army played a large role in that country's August rebellion, Lynne Duke reports

GOMA, Congo — When Congo's civil war broke out nearly three months ago, embattled President Laurent Kabila immediately proclaimed it an act of aggression from Rwanda and Uganda.

Kabila denied that the rebellion had any home-grown roots, and he whipped up deep-seated ethnic enmity among Congolese who believe that Rwandan and Congolese ethnic Tutsis want to control their country.

But although there is strong evidence of involvement by the Tutsis of both countries, many of those who revolted August 2 were from Kabila's 20,000-member, multi-ethnic 20th Army Brigade, in which there are few Tutsi members, rebel leaders here said.

Further, when fighting broke out in the capital city, Kinshasa, that same day, it involved Tutsis as well as a large contingent of Kabila's non-Tutsi cadogo — Swahili slang for "boy soldiers" — who had grown disgruntled with Kabila.

Rebel leaders paint a vastly more complex picture of the revolt than what has been put forward by Kabila and some in the international community. While Rwandan and Congolese Tutsi interests are a key factor in the rebellion, rebel leaders say an array of other political and ethnic parties also are involved.

They describe an insurrection that sprang from a chaotic, disgruntled and ethnically riven military in which several competing factions found common cause against Kabila as he allegedly began favoring his own Balubakat tribe within the army.

"He has created tribalism and division," said Sylvain Mbuchi, a senior rebel commander in Goma, a city in eastern Congo on the border with Rwanda.

KABILA'S government denies these allegations, but the Congolese military has long been divided.

After Kabila took power in May 1997 with the overthrow of dictator Mobutu Sese Seko, he had, in effect, four military factions to integrate: the cadogo youth recruits — some of them mere boys — who had marched across the country to oust Mobutu; troops from southern Katanga province, including Katangese gendarmes once in exile in Angola; the soldiers of Mobutu's army, known as the ex-FAZ; and Congolese Tutsis from the Kivu provinces in the east, people colloquially known as the Banyamulenge and centered in the southern Kivu town of Bukavu.

Complicating matters further were the Rwandans. Following Kabila's rise to power with Rwandan backing, the two countries agreed that hundreds of Rwanda's Tutsi troops would stay in Congo to help discipline and organize Kabila's new army.

Rwanda also was keen to monitor the progress of its new proteges, and some officials in Kinshasa say Rwanda, as well as Uganda, was trying to control Kabila.

Those East African power brokers had hoped that a strong Congolese army would enhance their security by stopping the cross-border movements of rebel groups. This was an especially sharp concern for Rwanda's Tutsi-dominated government, which continued to face cross-border raids from Rwandan Hutu extremists who perpetrated the 1994 genocide of more than 500,000 Rwandan Tutsis.

Instead, Kabila began warming up to the extremists, known as the Interahamwe, even recruiting them, according to Ernest Wamba dia Wamba, the rebels' political chairman.

"The Interahamwe are fought by the whole world," Mbuchi said. "Elsewhere, in other countries, they arrest them and send them to Arusha."

THE Tanzanian city of Arusha is the location of the International War Crimes Tribunal for Rwanda, where perpetrators of the 1994 genocide are being prosecuted. Kabila officials have denied that they recruited Interahamwe.

Kabila's faction-ridden army also grew increasingly unwieldy and chaotic. Kabila exacerbated the situation by playing favorites, rebels and analysts say.

He began packing the military command, especially his presidential guard, with people from his own Balubakat tribe, or with ethnic Lubas from Katanga province. These moves eroded his support among elements of the military's other competing factions — the ex-FAZ, the cadogo and the Tutsis.

Mbuchi, the rebel army's chief of intelligence and security, is a Balubakat, but he says he came to realize that Kabila's ethnic machinations would set up the same spiral of ethnic acrimony that characterized Mobutu's rule.

"When you say I am ex-FAZ, and another one says I am a Katangese gendarme and another one says I am Banyamulenge, the division comes in," he said. "It's better for us to say we are Congolese military."

The revolt is led by the 20th Brigade's commander, Jean-Pierre Ondekane, an ex-FAZ officer from Mobutu's home province, Equateur. The second in command is from the central region known as the Kasai. Kabila officials believe that James Kabarebe, a Rwandan commander also known as James Kabari, led the rebels' failed August offensive against Kinshasa, in western Congo, and remains a key rebel leader.

Rebels claim to have seized more than a third of Congolese territory and that they are pressing toward the diamond mining center at Mbuji Mayi. Control of that south-central crossroads could allow the rebels to cut off the southern region of Katanga from the rest of the country.

Kabila and his Zimbabwean allies are reportedly amassing troops and weaponry around Mbuji Mayi as well as in Katanga, though regional diplomats are attempting to broker a cease-fire in several rounds of talks being held this week.

THE anti-Kabila revolt was brewing for months, officials here say, as each military faction grew increasingly on edge in expectation of an imminent outbreak of fighting.

The cadogo grew restless when Kabila put the Katangese in charge of the presidential guard, a former preserve of the cadogo. Kabila tried to quell the dissent by arresting cadogo commanders. Wamba said. Banyamulenge troops also were being harassed and arrested, Karaha said.

Concern mounted in late July when Kabila announced that he was expelling the Rwandan soldiers and giving them a few days to leave the country. In eastern Congo, meanwhile, restlessness also was brewing.

Many troops of the 20th Brigade had wanted to revolt against Kabila for several months, Mbuchi said, but were afraid to do so because they assumed Rwanda would move against them.

With the Rwandan expulsion and the clear breach with Kabila, the 20th Brigade knew that Rwanda would not come rushing to Kabila's defense.

On the contrary, Rwanda sent troops back into Congo, but this time to bolster the anti-Kabila rebellion.

The man who edits the CIA's secrets

By Vernon Loeb

John Hollister Hedley sits behind a desk at the Central Intelligence Agency piled high with spy novels and memoirs by former agents and officials, a thick manuscript open before him. He hates to be called a censor, but it's his job to decide how far the CIA will go in revealing its inner workings to the outside world.

He is the man who edits the secrets. He has rejected an entire manuscript by an ex-agent whose career-long cover assignment was deemed too sensitive to reveal. He has deleted references to classified electronic intercept capabilities. He has even redacted information from a CIA cookbook of exotic recipes collected all over the world by operatives and their spouses.

But Hedley has distinguished himself as chairman of the CIA's publications review board over the past three years not so much for what he's taken out, but for what he's left in. He has helped establish new standards of openness that have allowed former spies, analysts and agency officials to go further than ever before in describing their clandestine careers.

"I think we need to open up, and I think we can have it both ways," said Hedley, 64, three months away from retirement after 30 years inside the agency's Directorate of Intelligence. "I do not think you endanger the protection of that which needs to be protected while you open up and are much more transparent than we've been, in terms of what kind of people we are, and what we do, and how we do it." A gradual move toward openness had begun even before Hedley took over the five-member panel that decides what all current and former employees can and cannot publish about the CIA. Thanks to the gradual thaw, business is booming.

The board has reviewed 18,000 manuscript pages and 300 works of fact, fiction and opinion in each of the past two years, a 43 percent increase over submissions handled five years ago.

Journalists and other outside authors are free to publish whatever they can uncover about the CIA's inner workings without restriction.

But agency personnel must sign secrecy agreements that are legal commitments not to publish anything during or after their time at the agency without official permission. The review board does not have authority to declassify information.

Pre-publication review typically involves judgment calls about the intellectual property of an author — recollections, impressions, narrative details. When such accounts deal with a previously undisclosed covert operation, as often happens, the board must weigh whether publication would damage the agency's sources and methods of intelligence gathering, which are protected by law.

"These people," Hedley said, "have a right to write." Such pronouncements provoke skepticism from critics on opposite sides of the openness debate. Some traditionalists inside the agency see the recent deluge of spy-and-tell accounts as heresy and think Hedley and others are leading the CIA to ruin. Agency dissidents on the outside who've been through the wars with the review board say the CIA pays lip service to openness but plays hardball with authors whose work is critical.

Take the case of Frank Snapp, a former CIA analyst who refused to submit his 1977 book on the fall of Saigon, Decent Interval, to the agency.

CIA headquarters at Langley, Virginia

Snapp said in a recent interview he bypassed the board because he considered the pre-publication review process to be "completely corrupt." Once the book came out, the agency sued him in an attempt to obtain all profits and then fought his appeals to the Supreme Court. The CIA ultimately won, confiscating more than $200,000 in royalties.

Later, in the mid-1980s, Snapp said, he submitted a screenplay about his battles with the CIA and waited for one-and-a-half years for clearance from the board, even though the courts had ruled in an earlier case that the board had to complete its initial review within 30 days.

This time, Snapp sued the agency. The CIA won again, he said, after an appellate court ruled the 30-day time limit was not binding.

But his luck may be changing. After Snapp recently submitted his latest book, Irreparable Harm, a chronicle of his publication battles with his former employer, the board cleared the work with only one minor change.

"They can pick and choose who they go after — and they usually go after the critics," Snapp said. "Hedley can say all he wants, but [decisions are] way out of his hands. And if he's articulated a new policy, I'd like to see it down on paper — that's something they never do." Hedley denies the board practices political censorship. He said the board has cleared scorching attacks on the agency that were, in his opinion, misguided and factually inaccurate — but not injurious to the agency's sources and methods.

And the board has had to kill manuscripts highly favorable to the agency, he said, because they revealed too much highly sensitive information. One such tale, he said, involved a daring rescue of CIA operatives by agents from a foreign intelligence service that would not normally be thought of as friendly to the United States. Telling the tale, Hedley said, would have brought that "covert" relationship to an end.

The agency's right to pre-publication review was first upheld by the courts after the CIA obtained a permanent injunction blocking ex-analyst Victor Marchetti's 1974 book, The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence, until he delivered the manuscript to the agency.

Philip Agee, who published a 1975 book, Inside the Company: CIA Diary, has been under court order since the early 1980s to submit all writings to the board and has done so on numerous occasions.

"They haven't been able to change a thing," he said in a telephone interview from his home in Hamburg.

Inside the Company, which named dozens of CIA officers and agents operating overseas, is held up by the agency as the example of the kind of damage that can be inflicted without pre-publication review. The State Department ultimately revoked Agee's US passport in 1979 for his disclosures.

The most recent author to battle the CIA is Patrick G. Eddington, a former agency photographic analyst who threatened to file suit two years ago when the agency initially refused to allow him to publish classified information pertaining to "Gulf War Syndrome" that the Pentagon had already made available on the Internet.

"The CIA ultimately backed down, and Eddington credits Hedley with arguing his case and saving the agency 'another ugly lawsuit' over his book, Gassed in the Gulf: The Inside Story of the Pentagon-CIA Cover-up of Gulf War Syndrome. Years before taking over the board in early 1996, the man who edits the secrets held a far different editing post, where the goal was to include everything. He edited the President's Daily Brief, the highly classified compendium of secrets the agency serves up six days a week to the president, the vice president, the secretary of state, the secretary of defense, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the national-security adviser.

"Sometimes you were just kind of awed by the whole thing," he said. "You know so much about what you're telling the president, it's kind of hard to know what you can talk about once you leave here. I think it was hard for my wife. She didn't really know exactly what I did, and I couldn't really talk about what I did." Hedley's legacy at the CIA, however, may be his role in helping establish "the Clarridge precedent," the new standard of disclosure enunciated by the pre-publication board in its review of Duane R. "Dewey" Clarridge's recent book, A Spy For All Seasons. Clarridge was amazed that Hedley and the board allowed him to describe numerous previously undisclosed covert actions, including a secret trip to Baghdad he made in 1985 to try to get President Saddam Hussein to surrender an alleged terrorist living in Iraq. "I pushed the envelope on the book," Clarridge said.

Hedley points out that the board sent Clarridge a 19-page, single-spaced list of comments and suggested redactions at the end of its opening, 30-day review. He also credits Clarridge's home within the agency, the highly secretive Directorate of Operations, for letting Clarridge tell his tale.

Milt Bearden, a former station chief in Islamabad, Pakistan, said the review board cleared his recent novel, The Black Tulip, with only minor redactions involving information about electronic intercepts. The board raised many an eyebrow, he said, at a description of a Soviet fighter shot down by an Afghan rebel using a US-made Stinger missile supplied by the CIA.

Looking at all the recent work pouring into the review board, Bearden said he isn't sure who has changed more, the board or the agency's retirees. Seven or eight years ago, he said, most covert operatives denounced those who retired and vented their spleens in print.

But now, Bearden said, even the man who vowed he'd never tell the secrets, 84-year-old former CIA director Richard Helms, is working on a memoir — and submitting it to the board for review, chapter by chapter.

"If we don't do it, it won't be recorded," Bearden said. His novel and Clarridge's memoir, he said, "could actually be good for a besieged CIA — to have some stuff out there that's not too hostile."

A fitful history

By Ephraim Gerber

LIBERALISM AND ITS DISCONTENTS by Alan Brinkley, Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press. 372pp. $27.95.

By taking his title from Freud's Civilization and its Discontents, Alan Brinkley signals that American Liberalism can never be at philosophical or doctrinal peace. Liberals, as the author recounts, may have entered the Great Depression convinced it was caused by an unholy alliance of government and industry, but then promoted an identical covenant in the early days of Roosevelt's New Deal. Liberalism may have formed a belief in the value of "Big Government," but then retreated hastily when Germany and Italy embodied the dangers of such a conception. It may have sought a natural base among the people, but then reacted with horror to populist demagogues like Huey Long of Louisiana in the 1930's or Christian evangelists like Oral Roberts (both brilliantly captured in separate chapters), whom the people served up, or who served themselves up to the people.

American liberalism, always staunchly capitalist, may define its mission as guaranteeing an improving material prospect for the American citizen-consumer, then despair at the damage to the environment and the resultant loss of spirituality which follow prosperity.

As Brinkley makes clear, all this Hamlet-like indecision could have been jettisoned with the birth of the New Left in the late 1950's and early 1960's. But that amorphous body could not promptly find an agenda. It then gravitated toward the Civil Rights Movement. But when African Americans interpreted the cause by different lights, the New Left largely abandoned it in order to stop the madness in Vietnam. That mission accomplished, as we all know, the New Left was quietly absorbed into the ranks of American investment bankers.

Like much of Americana, liberalism seems to have a short attention span.

Liberalism and its Discontents is a sympathetic account of Liberalism's fitful history in this century. Brinkley marshals a great deal of material and a rather long time-frame for such a relatively short book. His method is to bring certain representative people sharply to life and then show how these men (there are few women in these chapters) sometimes dominated events, but mostly how they did not.

Brinkley begins with a chiseled demythologizing, first of FDR and then of New Deal experimentation ("I really don't know what the basic principle of the New Deal is," Alvin Hansen, one of its architects, admitted in 1940). John Kennedy gets short shrift, but, then, the market seems to be bearish these days on the achievements of JFK's administration.

Brinkley carries the story of individuals through the tragic life and murder of Allard Lowenstein, the archetypal "liberal" who almost singlehandedly forced Lyndon Johnson to withdraw from the 1968 presidential election. From that chronological point the author concerns himself with more general issues.

Although Brinkley is clearly a liberal himself, his book is far more than an insider's lament. Great if belated victories over racism and sexism are credited to the liberal effort. But it is Brinkley's understanding of the other — more conservative — currents at work in American history that makes this book especially interesting. Liberalism and its Discontents manages to gain purchase far enough outside its subject for the reader to place American liberalism in context. Brinkley writes that "the problems liberalism has experienced are not simply a result of its own internal weaknesses, or of the broad forces it has failed to control. For despite the claims of the 'consensus' scholars that liberalism is the only important political tradition in America, nothing has become clearer over the last thirty years — both in historical scholarship and in our experience as a society — that the consensus argument, on that point at least, was wrong." This is what makes the chapters on Huey Long and Oral Roberts — and a gem about those "icons of the American Establishment," Stimson and McLeary — so important.

It also lends credibility to Brinkley's last chapter, entitled "The Problem of American Conservatism," about which Brinkley asks and partially answers the question: "Why has American conservatism not claimed enough attention from scholars to cause them to revise or overthrow their conceptual models in order to make a place for it?" Some scholars simply have no stomach for the religious fundamentalism that sometimes clusters around conservatism, or cannot think in any terms other than the rational, progressive course they believe is America's destiny.

But the fascinating irony which Brinkley teases out is that "American conservatism in the twentieth century has rested on a philosophical foundation not readily distinguishable from the liberal tradition to which it is, in theory, opposed.... Nothing, in fact, so irritated many conservatives in the 1930's and 1940's as the New Deal's appropriation of the word 'liberal'."

American liberalism and American conservatism are strange twins, then. Given American liberalism's angst-ridden passage from one ideological position to its opposite over the course of this century, this should not be surprising.

The "vanity press wars" in England ratcheted up a notch when Jonathan Clifford discovered that the wheel-nuts on his car were mysteriously loosened earlier this year. "This is one of a series of attacks and threats to stop me from my campaign," says Clifford, aged 58. "It doesn't bear thinking about what could have happened if the wheel had come off. I'm absolutely certain that this was because of my campaign against the vanity press." Clifford, who has fought tirelessly for five years to institute tighter controls over the vanity publishing industry, has in the last year had dozens of telephone calls threatening violence unless he drops his campaign.

The unscrupulous vanity publisher preys on the hopes and dreams of inexperienced authors. The scam begins with small ads in writers' magazines and the general press requesting book submissions. Submitted works are "evaluated" to encourage the gullible. Letters and contracts promise advertising, distribution, newspaper reviews and royalties. The author pays an exorbitant sum for the "service." The books are usually sub-standard, often poorly edited or not edited at all, and sometimes printed without proof-reading. To add insult to injury, books left over from the so-called "sales period" are sold back to the client at a "reduced cost."

Two names to watch out for are Minerva Press and Avon in Britain. Both use slightly altered names of well-known companies (Minerva, an imprint of Reed Books; and Avon Books, a division of the Hearst Corp.); thus unsuspecting writers think they are dealing with a mainstream publisher. Authors worldwide, including some in Israel, have fallen into the trap. For free advice, victims of vanity publishers are encouraged to contact Jonathan Clifford at 27 Mill Road, Fareham, Hants. PO16 0TH, U.K.; Tel/Fax Int'l 44 01329 822218.

TEN YEARS ago a young customer came into a bookstore in Oxford, Mississippi, and said he was writing a book. Richard Howarth, owner of Square Books, thought, "Yeah, yeah." In time, having sold that novel, the man returned and asked if he could do a signing, his first, in Howarth's shop. So Howarth sat him down and explained to him how it's done, "that he needed to invite all of his friends, family and colleagues." His launching sold 53 copies, which at the time Howarth considered "not bad." The book was A Time to Kill (Wynwood) and the author was John Grisham. From such small beginnings, Grisham has dominated the 1990s with millions of books sold. But for all his success, Grisham never forgot the early support Square Books gave him, and with the publication of each new novel, he comes back to hold a signing.

ALLEN DRURY, winner of the Pulitzer Prize in 1960 for his novel Advise and Consent, died at age 80 in September. Drury was born in Texas, but he grew up in California and was educated at Stanford University. His first reporting job was on the Tulare California Bee newspaper, and during World War II he served as a UPI Senate reporter. In 1954 The New York Times hired him to cover Capitol Hill. In his years in Washington for the Times, he stole early morning hours to write Advise and Consent, a novel of political intrigue and betrayal. In his career, Drury turned out five nonfiction books and 19 novels, six of which were sequels to

The politics of Wye

Though the Wye Memorandum was long in the making, its signature has much like the signing of the Oslo Declaration of Principles five years ago, caught the Israeli political scene flat-footed. Instantly, both the Left and the Right have split over how to relate to the post-Wye Netanyahu government. The Labor Party, in particular, has been expressing its ambivalence by promising a political "safety net" while pressing for new elections. Now is not a time, however, for straddling the fence: those who support the agreement should ask themselves what will facilitate its implementation.

The successful carrying out of the Wye agreement is far from a foregone conclusion. Already, a snag has emerged over the Palestinian "work plan" for combating terrorism. Israel says the Palestinians have broken a verbal agreement to submit the plan within a week, while PA security chief Mohammed Dahlan - who was supposed to draft the plan - is reportedly in Europe on a private business trip. As a result, Israel has postponed the cabinet vote on the agreement until the working plan has been seen by Israel.

It is understandable that the cabinet would want to see the security working-plan before voting on the agreement, given its centrality to the whole agreement. Presumably, this snag will be resolved, but it is indicative of what it will take to ensure full implementation in the days and weeks to come. Implementing the Wye agreement fully will cause no less political turmoil on the Palestinian side. The Palestinians, as they have before, will likely seek to avoid such turmoil by cutting corners on the agreement to the degree that this is tolerated by Israel and the United States.

Though the opposition did not agree with all the government's demands of the Palestinians at Wye, there was agreement that the Palestinians were falling far short in the fight against terrorism. Opposition leader Ehud Barak knows full well that it will take a united front of the government, the opposition, and the United States to ensure the Palestinians combat their own militants.

During the delicate and critical period of the Wye accord's implementation, the Labor Party is expected to provide the government with a "safety net" of support in no-confidence votes. This is as it should be, because Wye implemented is Oslo par excellence. Since an opposition's job is to oppose, it is not surprising that Labor has trouble mustering more than grudging support for the agreement. At the same time, Labor is missing an opportunity to declare victory for its own path. Rather than unequivocally following its pledge to support the government when it adopts Labor's pro-Oslo path, the Labor Party has chosen to support NRP MK Hanan Porat's bill to schedule early elections. Though some Labor MKs have argued that scheduling elections for next March, or later, will not hamper implementation of Wye, this claim is difficult to accept. A looming election campaign would create pressures in both directions regarding the inevitable disputes with the Palestinians over implementation: both to implement the agreement despite violations and to stop implementation over resolvable differences. Israel's room to maneuver - whether to be tough or flexible when needed - would be restricted.

Though Barak remains for the moment adamantly opposed to a unity government, and Netanyahu seems uninterested in such a prospect, there is now nothing stopping the two major parties from speaking with one voice on the peace process. Even political rivals, under certain circumstances, can benefit from close cooperation. For Barak, full-throated cooperation with Netanyahu in demanding Palestinian compliance with Wye will show the public that pursuing peace and security is more important than politics. For Netanyahu, Barak's cooperation strengthens his hand with the Palestinians and the US, increasing the chances that this time, reciprocity will really happen.

This cooperation can only come about, however, in the context of a rhetorical cease-fire. Netanyahu must stop accusing the previous government of having planned to give away territory like there was no tomorrow; Barak must tentatively admit that Netanyahu is implementing Oslo, and plans to conclude a final-status agreement. Neither side can know where such cooperation would lead, or how long it could last. The Labor Party, for its part, has nothing to lose. So long as Netanyahu is credibly implementing Oslo and pursuing a full peace agreement, Labor has little chance of competing with him politically on the peace issue. If Netanyahu strays from that path, whether from ideological or coalition considerations, Barak can always go back to a more standard opposition mode - but with greater credibility than had he not been supportive during this critical period.

The View From the East

DAUD KUTTAB

Nothing new

The Wye Plantation Memorandum, which was signed in an internationally publicized ceremony, is not a peace agreement. It doesn't contain any major new elements. It is simply a confirmation by the parties to implement what had been agreed to and signed between Israel and the Palestinians.

Nevertheless, the Wye Memorandum could be very important to Middle East peace. It marks, for the first time, an unambiguous embrace by Israel's right-

River will actually be implemented. Only persistent follow-up by the United States, at the highest level, will ensure that the Wye Agreement will be carried out in all its details.

To deliver home the message of peace, Palestinians of all walks of life must see and feel the change. They must enjoy the right to be free and independent. The ability to move around in one's own country, to travel in and out of one's homeland and to pursue economic prosperity should not be wing Likud Party - including Ariel Sharon - of the Oslo peace process which was begun by the late Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

For Palestinians, this agreement couldn't have come at a better time. The level of frustration and skepticism had reached dangerous proportions.

The procrastination of Binyamin Netanyahu, his government's settlement policy and the apparent inability of the US to do anything had left a bitter taste in Palestinian mouths. Ever since Netanyahu's razor-thin victory, Palestinians have witnessed more land confiscation, violent Israeli repression, travel restrictions, house demolitions and no movement in the peace process.

Since his election in 1996, Israel's prime minister has formally accepted the Oslo Accords, but his action (or inaction) has left the world skeptical of his motives. Many in Palestine and the Arab world began to doubt whether his government would ever implement the accords. Indeed, many still doubt that what has been agreed upon near Maryland's Wye obtained as a result of Israeli charity. It must be clear in word and deed that such basic rights are inalienable, and must be honored.

Palestinians have prayed for the day that their lives will no longer be used as a political bargaining chip. The Wye Plantation Memorandum should put an end to this dark chapter of holding the people of the region hostage to the political ambitions of power-hungry politicians.

ON the other hand, Palestinians are concerned about the implications of some of the security arrangements hammered out between the Palestinian leadership, Israeli security officials and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Human rights organizations are afraid that the Palestinian Authority will use this agreement, and the international support it has received, to crack down on Palestinian opposition.

The fear is that the crackdown will not be limited to militant Islam but will also include political Islam, and any other national

What happened to the economic miracle?

ELIYAHU KANOVSKY

Among the charges leveled by the opposition against Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu is that his government has mishandled economic affairs, resulting in recession and rising unemployment.

They note that between 1990 and 1996 there was rapid economic growth, declining rates of unemployment, and rising incomes. The boom period came to a halt in 1996, presumably a consequence of the economic policies of Netanyahu's government, elected in mid-1996.

But this is not so. In an article in this paper a few weeks before those elections, I noted that the prosperity in 1993-96, under the Rabin-Peres government, was based on large and rapidly growing balance of payments (current account) deficits. These deficits were covered largely by foreign borrowing and an expanding external debt.

My conclusion at that time was that no matter which party won the elections, the new government would have to implement painful budgetary cutbacks, which would almost certainly bring on a recession and rising unemployment. Austerity measures are usually an integral part of the "bitter medicine" taken to combat balance of payments deficits and also curb inflation.

The results of the new measures taken by the Netanyahu government and the "tight money" policy of the Bank of Israel were not long in coming.

The balance of payments (the current account) which had been in approximate balance for three years (1990-92), deteriorated badly between 1993 and 1996, going from a minus $1.8 billion in 1993 to a minus $5.3b. in 1996, but in 1997 the deficit was sharply reduced to $3.6b., and was heading downward. Bank Hapoalim projects a deficit of $2b. in 1998 and $1b. in 1999.

Austerity measures may, at times, be a necessary evil, but they are painful especially for those who have lost their jobs or new graduates who can't find a first job. Nevertheless, the opposition should know better than to point an accusing finger at the present government's economic policies. The Bank of Israel's annual report noted recently that "many of the economic developments of 1997 can be regarded as corrections (emphasis added) of the previous trends which, although characterized by high growth rates, embodied a growing risk of a balance of payments crisis and the undermining of economic stability."

Israel's main export markets are the US and Europe. Nonetheless, the crisis in Asia has had an impact, especially on diamond sales. In 1997, about one third of Israel's diamonds went to the Asian countries, and it will not be easy to find substitute markets. During the first half of 1998, Israel's total diamond exports were down 15%, largely because of the crisis in that region.

Other than diamonds, most Israeli exports to Asia are in the high-tech area including advanced systems, semi-conductors and communications.

What is noteworthy is that despite the setbacks in Asia, Israel's overall exports (goods and services, excluding diamonds) rose 8% in 1997, as compared with 5% growth in 1996. Export growth was led by manufacturing, and especially by high-tech exports. Israel's rapidly growing high-tech industries attracted large-scale foreign private investment in Israel which reached an unprecedented $3.7b. in 1997.

Overall, Israel's commodity exports rose by 3% (measured in current dollars). Excluding diamonds, industrial exports rose 10%, with still higher rates of growth in the high-tech industries. The trade deficit (total exports minus imports of goods) fell by a creditable 27%. Far lower international oil prices contributed to the strong reduction in Israel's trade deficit.

NO one can predict when the upturn in the economy will begin. The Bank of Israel estimates that reduced exports to Asia will lower Israel's GDP (gross domestic product) in 1998 by about 0.7%. This is a significant figure. If the Asian crisis also reduces American GDP, the impact on Israel will be even more adverse.

On the plus side are Israel's relatively advanced state of technology and the large number of people with technical skills. The rapid growth of high tech in Israel has few precedents, and foreign capital is still pouring into these companies. Another plus for Israel are the far lower oil prices which could reduce Israel's fuel import bill by possibly $200 million a year, or more, as compared with 1996-97.

My own projections today, as in the past, are that oil prices will be low (the current level) or lower, at least when measured in constant (inflation-corrected) dollars. On the other hand, wars or revolutions in any of the major oil-exporting countries could again raise prices very sharply - temporarily.

Economists call the employment and unemployment figures "lagging indicators." In other words, it takes a few months, possibly a year or longer, before an expansion in national product translates into many more job openings. Israel has experienced this time lag as have the US and other countries. For Israel unemployment is a social, political as well as an economic curse, insofar as it encourages emigration, which adversely affects morale.

Until now, the government has put the greater emphasis on overall (macro) fiscal and monetary policy. But given the urgency, it will also have to employ more micro measures to help solve the unemployment problem, with all due haste. This will require more investment in infrastructure (roads, ports, airports, water and electricity, telecommunications, etc.), which are needed in their own right, but are also labor-intensive.

With a little bit of luck and wise policies, the people of Israel can still enjoy a prosperous future.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DIRECT ELECTIONS

Sir, - Former minister Moshe Arens' plea for revoking the direct election law has not fallen on the public's "deaf ears" but sadly under our present electoral system we the citizens have no channel by which to influence parliamentary activity.

The electorate is effectively disenfranchised during the years between elections and Arens himself was vociferous in his opposition to the idea of electoral reform as mooted by Chaim Herzog and others in the early 1980s.

On the other hand let it not be forgotten that Bibi Netanyahu, the first directly elected prime minister, was the chief protagonist in the changing of the Basic Law to that which we have today.

Desperate for what they naively thought would be the beginning of true reform leading to accountability from elected representatives, the popular movements for change were heartened by Netanyahu's unwavering dedication to the cause.

In the face of his own party's opposition, he travelled the length and breadth of the country (and the US, to raise funds) to support and encourage the activists.

Directly elected MKs would have provided the electorate with a voice in the Knesset which has never been needed or than now.

HAVE YOUR CAKE...

Sir, - Great news! The clinics of Kupat Holim Clalit and Maccabi are no longer open on Friday. I am very happy for all those who now have their Friday free of work. Just one thing disturbs me: who is paying for the day they don't work?

I presume this free day is done in order to economize on the health expenses. So I presume all the workers in these clinics are getting less wages?

No? Really, why? Going over to a five-day week and adding those Friday hours to make a longer working day is one thing. But to just willy-nilly cut down the working hours and say this is "in order to economize" means we the public are paying for it.

I have not yet heard the public complaining. We just sit in longer queues! Come on: let's shout! Let the clinics be open every day till 6.45 or 7 p.m. Then you can have your Friday off. You can't eat your cake and still have it!!

TO DIE IN PEACE

Sir, - Thank you for your excellent article "Allowing the terminally ill to die in peace" (Oct. 4). We appreciate Ms. Siegel-Itzkovich's report on the need for education on how to offer suitable palliative care for doctors and nurses, and the coverage on Dr. Cherny's efforts to develop programs on palliative care in the various medical schools in Israel.

As the son and daughter of Bella Sebbia we particularly appreciate the information included in your article about the palliative care lectures in her memory. We read with interest about families in Israel dealing with a terminal illness, and were pleased to note Dr. Fefer's intention to attend the Sebbia symposium following his recognition that he "hadn't been taught palliative medicine." We regret that our mother did not have the benefit of Dr. Cherny's expertise and applaud his efforts to enable his patients to "die in peace, without suffering."

Everyman in orbit

HELEN SCHARY MOTRO

In 1964 space hero John Glenn slipped badly - in his bathroom. This shortly after having survived blast-off, historic space flight and re-entry into earth's atmosphere without a scratch. Injuries to his inner ear were serious enough to force withdrawal from the Senate race. During his slow recovery, a disheartened Glenn referred to himself as a "depressed area."

The ironic injury cut the astronaut down to size. From Superman he became Everyman. Even orbiting the earth doesn't confer immunity against the hard knocks of life. Just as he could trip on the bathroom mat while shaving like the boy next door, Glenn's personality allowed any of us to fantasize circling the planet ourselves.

Although Glenn went on to serve 28 years as US senator and even run for president, with his smiling straightforwardness he remains Everyman at 77.

Today Everyman is scheduled to go up in orbit once more, one of the handful of lucky mortals who get the chance to relive their greatest thrill. Vicariously, so do we earthlings.

Officially the purpose of Glenn's spot on the flight is to aid research into the aging process. That's how he was able to finagle a seat on board the space shuttle Discovery. Astronauts and the aged apparently share several common complaints: sleep and balance disorders, muscle and bone deterioration. Last week doctors announced that Glenn had failed the medical criteria for one melatonin study and they cancelled his involvement in it.

BUT little note. For the eyes of the world the research is secondary, at best. What is stunning is the symbol of a septuagenarian in a space-suit playing around with weightlessness. Glenn's balding head encased in a transparent space helmet beams out from the cover of LIFE.

Glenn's participation has been subject to criticism precisely on this point - that the bottom line scientific return is questionable, rendering the whole escapade a waste of money. Granted that senior citizen Glenn in space may be a largely symbolic journey,

Then we must ask ourselves: how much is a symbol worth? What is the value of a parade? Of a flag on every public monument? Of an old man having the guts to voluntarily knock at heaven's door while still on earth?

THE STEREOTYPE paints a man of Glenn's age meant to be sunning on a park bench or boarding the bus to visit grandchildren. So Glenn's trajectory today gives encouragement that age does not spell automatic obsolescence. Yet, Glenn himself may be a symbol of changing times. As society turns its back upon traditional deference towards the aged, their increased numbers and longevity empower them to make up in power lobbies what they have lost in respect.

Glenn's Senate colleague, 95-year-old Strom Thurmond, claims that if NASA were really interested in geriatric research, they ought to let him take Glenn's place on the flight. As the concept of age discrimination takes hold it can no longer be said with impunity

"Over forty need not apply" - at least not out loud.

Responding to workers' pressure to be allowed to stay on the job, some mandatory retirement ages have been raised, like the one for commercial pilots upped to 65.

If, as they say, old age entrenches old patterns, Glenn proves the cliché.

He quips that the aim of life is "to burn out, not rust out." Why would Glenn suddenly turn into T.S. Eliot's timid old man wondering if he dared to eat a peach?

Glenn revisiting space mimics on a grander scale his fellow World War Two veterans who returned to France in 1994 to mark the 50th anniversary of D-Day. Reenacting the invasion, the skies over Normandy soon filled with paratroopers in their 70s dangling from parachutes. Refusing to go gently into the good night, they, like Glenn, reaffirmed the life force.

As he zooms "faster than the speed of sound" past nursing homes and nursery schools alike, Glenn gives hope to every age. More role model than quinceañera, he proves that it's the young at heart who fly the highest, even the second time around.

A Pryor engagement

Trailblazing black comedian
Richard Pryor, now racked by MS, is the first recipient of the Mark Twain Prize for American humor

By SHARON WAXMAN

Richard Pryor's comedy took your breath away. He stalked the stage like a restless hunter. He told angry, painful, side-splitting truths about his childhood in a brothel, his adulthood as a sex-crazed hound dog and a cocaine-sucking junkie. Along the way he ripped the veneer off society's polite relationships between blacks and whites, cops and criminals, rich and poor, men and women, parents and children, even humans and animals. He lanced the boil on the US's national complexion. He cleared the air. Last week Pryor, 58, became the first recipient of the Mark Twain Prize, established this year by the Kennedy Center to salute American humor.

"He's very similar to Mark Twain, especially in terms of being among the first humorists to talk about race, about black and white and the relations between them, about the silliness and stupidity of prejudice," says Lawrence J. Wilk, president of the Kennedy Center. Sometimes it seemed Pryor's entire vocabulary consisted of the N-word, the P-word and the mother-lovin' F-word. Most of his material couldn't be printed in this or any other newspaper. Pryor probably spent most of his adulthood in an altered condition. Most people know that. Most know his personal life is an unmitigated train wreck. Five ex-wives. Six children, most of them estranged. One near-successful attempt at self-immolation while freebasing cocaine. Now there is multiple sclerosis, a disease that appeared a decade ago, reducing Pryor to a thinking, feeling captive of himself.

He is ill but manages to say this much in a labored interview: "I have a lot of pain that I cannot express." A very long silence ensues. "I feel glad that I have it in my head. And I'm very frustrated now." Sometimes he writes it down, he says, "but I wish I could say it." He can't anymore. No, he croaks. "I'm afraid not."

Much of Pryor's career was spent in the so-called "mainstream," making movies like Silver Streak, Car Wash, Which Way Is Up? and California Sults; more than 30 in all. The films were nowhere near as raw (or as good) as his stand-up material, but the camera revealed a face in which fear and innocence were writ large, in which a wide-eyed, child-like vulnerability was ever-present. There was nothing menacing about Richard Pryor's face, no matter how much profanity spewed from his mouth.

But he beat one of his wives to within an inch of her life. He went to jail for tax evasion, assault and drug possession. One New Year's Eve, while under the influence, he shot at his car with a .357 magnum. Of course, later he told on himself to the audience.

More painful was his recounting of the 1980 fire, when he doused himself with cognac while free-basing cocaine, and "accidentally" (in recent years he has acknowledged the incident as a suicide attempt) lit himself on fire, jumped out a window and ran, burning, down the block. He was lucky to survive, with third-degree burns over half of his body.

"Have you ever burned up? It's weird," he later told the audience. "You know something I noticed? When you run down the street on fire, people will move out of your way."

There are plenty of reasons Richard Pryor should have turned out a mess, but not a single reason he should have been so funny.

He grew up around the family brothels in Peoria, Illinois, raised by an iron-fisted grandmother and an abusive father. Pryor's parents divorced when he was 10, but not before Pryor saw his mother slash his father's testicles with her nails during a fight.

There are even more painful confessions in his 1995 book, about being molested as a boy by a neighborhood pedophile named Hoss. About racism: getting called "nigger" by the father of a white girl he liked in his class ("Zap," he writes. "Six inches of self-esteem gone"). Also poverty, gangs, expulsion from school at 14 for taking a swing at a teacher. Expulsion from the army several years later for stabbing a white soldier.

He came back from overseas to do menial jobs, but wormed his way into telling jokes at a local nightclub. Performing gave Pryor something he never had at home: acceptance, love, attention.

And he was good at making people laugh. By the early '60s he was making a living as an emcee, traveling the "black belt" of Midwestern nightclubs.

He discovered women. "I caught women as if they were taxis," he writes. Black women, white women, prostitutes, fans. Even

Like the writer Mark Twain, Richard Pryor (seen above in the film 'Blue Collar') lends his sense of humor to questions of race.

Today, Richard Pryor's voice is a high-pitched whine, a faint, weary thread down the telephone wire. He has agreed to an interview to mark the occasion of the prize, but prefers not to meet in person. He spends most of his time in a wheelchair, stripped gradually by the disease of the ability to perform basic functions. His condition, however, is stable.

Long questions are followed by one-word answers. He says, "Yes ma'am," when asked if he is pleased by the Twain prize. "I wasn't expecting it," he says. "There are a lot of comedians out there. I'm very pleased. Surprised." This exchange takes several minutes.

A nurse's voice whispers in the background; eventually it becomes clear she is dictating some answers in his ear. The disease? "This is my cross," he repeats as she audibly mouths the words. "God sent it to me." But some of the remarks come from Pryor, not his caretaker.

"I'm a pioneer," he says. "That's my contribution. I broke barriers for black comics. I was being Richard Pryor; that was me on that stage." Long pause. "But I was on drugs at the time." Always? "Most of the time."

Another pause.

"The drugs didn't make me funny. God made me funny. The drugs kept me up in my imagination. But I felt" - he stops again. The wait is interminable. But he finishes - "pa-the-tic afterward." For the record, there is no known link between multiple sclerosis and Pryor's previous excesses.

With an irony befitting Pryor's outsize past, the ex-wife he used to physically abuse, Jennifer Lee, is now his caretaker, organizing the armies of nurses and staff members needed to sustain him. When she came in 1994 at Pryor's request, Lee fired a houseful of freeloaders. She dumped the lawyers and accountants, too, slashed child support payments and got rid of the guns in the house. She also accepted Pryor's constant, abject apologies for his past behavior.

In his memoir, Pryor explains, "I didn't want merely to shock people. I also wanted to be good."

Today you ask why and he says the following, with no prompting: "Anything for a laugh" - a moment passes, and then comes the kicker: "You have to develop a taste for it." And he laughs, a strange, choking sound from the man whose humor hit him where it hurt.

(The Washington Post)

one transvestite.

He discovered drugs, his instant crutch and his most potent tool for inspiration and for self-destruction. From the time he started doing cocaine in the mid-'60s, Pryor rarely performed when he wasn't loaded.

Pryor started performing in Greenwich Village. He patterned his act after Bill Cosby. But though successful, by 1967 Pryor was dissatisfied. He had more to say.

He worked on his new act in Los Angeles, at black clubs like the one owned by Redd Foxx, and it came together in a debut album. In 1969 he started doing movies, and Pryor was on his way to stardom.

A friendly byte downtown

By GWEN ACKERMAN

The Netcafe is a friendly place. Meet a friend there for coffee, a beer or a game of backgammon. Browse the bulletin board, surf the Net or send an e-mail to family back home.

Opened just five months ago, Netcafe caters to just about everyone. A glance upstairs, where the cafe's six computers are all busy, reveals haredi and Orthodox yeshiva students, a backpacker passing through, a tourist and an Israeli carrying a motorcycle helmet.

While waiting for a free terminal, one can flip through a Lonely Planet guide book to Israel and the Palestinian territories or pick up one of the newspapers and magazines lying on the counter.

Looking for something more substantial to read? Bring in a paperback you've finished and exchange it for a book sitting on the shelf in the corner. Cards, backgammon, checkers and chess games are also available to pass the time or just have fun.

If you're hungry, take your pick from the reasonably priced, simple kosher menu of quiche (NIS 25), salads (NIS 22), sandwiches (NIS 10), cakes (NIS 17 for an enormous slice) and ice cream. Winter will bring a choice of soups.

In the grand tradition of the now-defunct Richie's Pizza, friends can leave messages for each other on the bulletin board, which also boasts ads for apartments and computers for sale.

Netcafe owner Janice Chaim said she was aiming to fill the hole.

"There was a need for one-year students to have a place to go," she says. "I also realized that people who are traveling for two to four months and come in to write home are looking for a friendly, warm place."

Many of the people who walk in are greeted by name, either by Janice or other Netcafe employees.

While on the computer some laugh and some cry - one girl came in to break up with her boyfriend by e-mail.

"Someone told me that what I need is the computer in one corner, a therapist in the other," Janice joked.

Secret on my mind

Maccabi Haifa & Israel striker Alon Mizrahi talks about his most important goals

When asked to recall the first goal he ever scored, Alon Mizrahi laughs and says he can't remember.

"That was a long time ago," says the Maccabi Haifa striker, who has scored 114 goals in his National Soccer League career. "There's no way I can remember."

"I do remember my first goal in the National League," he says. "I was 18 and playing for Hapoel Tel Aviv. I scored it against Hapoel Holon. It was a low shot from seven meters out."

Mizrahi, who will be 27 next month, has been terrifying National League goalies for a while. Israeli goalies and soccer fans have become accustomed to Mizrahi's powerful strides, lethal shots and cunning in the penalty area in the 233 National League games he has played with Hapoel Tel Aviv, Bnei Yehuda, Maccabi Tel Aviv, Ironi Ashdod and Maccabi Haifa.

Apart from the green of Maccabi Haifa, Mizrahi also wears the blue and white of the Israeli national team, where he has scored eight goals in 21 matches.

This season, Maccabi Haifa seems to be struggling. Mizrahi has yet to score and the team has two wins and a draw against two losses.

But on the European stage, the side has made its presence felt. By knocking the French team Paris St. Germain out of the Cup Winners' Cup to advance to the quarterfinals, Maccabi Haifa has scaled new heights for a local club and made Israeli soccer history.

After losing its first quarterfinal match 2-1 to SV Reid, an Austrian club, in Austria, Maccabi Haifa needs to win the return leg at Kiryat Eliezer next Thursday. Mizrahi, who wore the captain's armband in the last match, will need to lead the way. If he scores, as he did in the away leg, he just may add to the following list of goals, which he considers the most important of his career.

2. Maccabi Haifa 1, Parma 0 (Rome), October 20, 1993
"We had lost the first leg of the European Cup-Winners' Cup in Haifa 1-0. It was a tight game but in the second half of the game, I got through the defense and beat the goalie from 16 meters. After 90 minutes we were tied with the Italians (on aggregate), but we lost in the [penalty] shootout and didn't advance."
3. Israel 1, Romania 0 (Bucharest), March 18, 1998
"Israel had never won in Romania before that game and they are a strong team. I was happy that I scored the goal... I got a nice pass [from Eli Aburabanel], made a nice 30-meter run, and I put it high into the goal."
4. Maccabi Haifa 3, Paris St. Germain 2 (Haifa), October 1, 1998
"I got a good pass [from Yaniv Katan] and from in close, chipped it over the goalie and high into the net [giving Maccabi Haifa a 2-1 lead]. The feeling then was the same as on every goal - I was very happy - it was awesome."
5. Maccabi Haifa 3, Paris St. Germain 2 (Haifa), October 1, 1998
"The winning goal [was] a really special goal because it put us into the next stage of the Cup-Winners' Cup. It was a really special moment. We were in injury time and I took a shot from 20 meters. It hit a [defender's] leg and floated into the net."

The best of the world's vegetarian fare

America's favorite international dishes can be as healthful as they are delicious — with the right touch, Steven Petusevsky writes.

The adoption and adaption of foods from other countries are what make America's culinary landscape exciting. But many people also tend to forget where these favorites came from originally.

Spaghetti, kebabs, and egg rolls didn't just sprout up in American fast-food stands or at corner cafes. Nor did the plates of kasha with caramelized onions and bowls of pudding made with grated potatoes that I scarfed down as a child of Russian-born parents. But I always thought of all of it as typically "American" food.

So what is "American" and what isn't? Who cares? The main thing is that the Americans have melded foods from China, Vietnam, India, Italy and Mexico into a cuisine of their own.

I love these international influences on American cuisine because of their pure flavors. I love it when my taste buds are jolted with sweet, sour, salty and spicy sensations all at once.

The problem, however, with many international foods is their fat content. Many countries traditionally cook — or deep-fry — their foods with liberal amounts of fat.

Though that may be the authentic method of preparation in some countries, I always have thought it possible to use an enlightened hand, especially in traditional vegetarian favorites such as lentil dal, without compromising the taste. Who knows? The time might not be that far off when moo shu is bigger than macaroni.

VEGETABLE MOO SHU

You can substitute flour tortillas for the quick Chinese pancakes, if desired.

15 gr. package dried wood-ear mushrooms
2 cups boiling water
1 tsp. dark sesame oil
1 tsp. vegetable oil
3 large eggs, lightly beaten
1 Tbsp. minced, peeled fresh ginger
2 garlic cloves, minced
4 cups thinly sliced green cabbage
1 cup thinly sliced red bell pepper
1 cup diagonally sliced green onions
3 Tbsp. rice vinegar
2 Tbsp. dry sherry
2 Tbsp. soy sauce
2 Tbsp. hoisin sauce
fresh chives (optional)
quick Chinese pancakes (recipe below)

Combine mushrooms and boiling water in a bowl, cover and let stand 30 minutes or until soft. Drain and slice mushrooms into thin strips.

Heat sesame and vegetable oils in a large nonstick skillet or wok over medium-high heat. Add eggs and stir-fry 2 minutes. Remove eggs from pan. Add minced ginger and garlic to pan and stir-fry 1 minute.

Add mushrooms, cabbage and bell pepper to pan and stir-fry 2 minutes. Add onions and next 4 ingredients (onions through hoisin sauce) and stir-fry 1 minute. Stir in eggs.

Garnish with fresh chives, if desired. Serve with quick Chinese pancakes. (Serves 4.)

QUICK CHINESE PANCAKES

1 1/2 cups flour
1/2 cups milk
1 Tbsp. margarine or butter, melted
1 large egg
1 Tbsp. minced fresh chives
1/2 tsp. five-spice powder cooking spray

Lightly spoon flour into dry measuring cups and level with a knife. Place the flour in a medium-sized bowl.

Combine milk, margarine and egg; add milk mixture to flour, stirring with a whisk until blended. Stir in fresh chives and five-spice powder. Cover and chill for 1 hour.

Place a 20cm. crepe pan or non-stick skillet coated with cooking spray over medium-high heat until hot. Remove pan from heat and pour a scant 1/4 cup batter into pan; quickly tilt pan in all directions so batter covers bottom of pan. Cook about 1 minute.

Carefully lift edge of pancake with a spatula to test for doneness. The pancake will be ready to turn when it can be shaken loose from pan and the underside is lightly browned. Turn pancake over and cook 30 seconds on the other side.

Place the pancake on a towel and cool. Repeat the procedure until all of the batter is used. Stack the pancakes between single layers of wax paper or paper towels to prevent pancakes from sticking. (Makes 12 pancakes.)

LENTIL DAL

This is a traditional Indian dish made with lentils, tomatoes, onions and spices. This one is chunkier than most.

1 Tbsp. olive oil
1 cup chopped onion
1 Tbsp. minced peeled fresh ginger
1 tsp. cumin seeds
1 tsp. ground turmeric
1/2 tsp. crushed red pepper
4 garlic cloves, minced
2 cups chopped cauliflower florets
2 cups chopped tomato
2 1/2 cups water
1 cup dried lentils
2 Tbsp. lime or lemon juice
1 Tbsp. minced fresh coriander
1/2 tsp. salt
6 cups hot cooked long-grain rice

Heat olive oil in a large saucepan over medium-high heat. Add onion and next 5 ingredients (onion through garlic) and saute 2 minutes. Add cauliflower and tomato and saute 1 minute.

Stir in water and lentils and bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat and simmer 35 minutes or until lentils are tender. Stir in lime juice, coriander and salt. Serve with rice. (Serves 6.)

VIETNAMESE SOFT SPRING ROLLS

Phyllis's Tips

buy some stainless-steel pots to replace them. If you're cooking on a halogen burner, make sure the pots you buy have at least two-layered bottoms.

In the drawer where you keep aluminum foil, plastic wrap, and sandwich bags, add waxed paper for wrapping sandwiches and parchment paper for baking. Use aluminum foil only as a last resort.

The best way to store some staples is in airtight jars. Although Tupperware makes storage containers with an excellent seal, glass is the purest way to store dry goods and food. You can recycle glass spaghetti-sauce jars and glass jam jars and use them for storing food.

Use dish soap for cleaning counters when possible, rather than harsher products that may come in contact with food. Adding a little plain vinegar to the cleaning water will help inhibit the growth of bacteria.

If you have an old refrigerator, buy a thermometer and check the temperature. It should be between 0° and 3° centigrade for best fruit and vegetable storage. Check if the refrigerator is closing properly by shutting the door on a piece of paper. If the paper can be moved up and down easily, the rubber seal on the refrigerator needs to be replaced. If you don't fix it, you're not only paying more for electricity because the refrigerator is working harder as warm air is entering it, but you're also subjecting your foodstuffs to temperatures that encourage the development of bacteria.

If you own an old microwave, it might be a good idea to have it checked once a year or every two years for leakage. Do you have special cooking and/or reheating utensils for the microwave? You should. Do not use plastic utensils in the microwave unless they are specifically designed for microwave use. If you don't want to invest in new utensils, use glass utensils to cook or reheat.

Now it's time to examine your pantry. Go through your kitchen cabinets and refrigerator and read all the labels of the foods you've bought. If you find products with ingredients you aren't familiar with, write them down. If the food products you buy have ingredients that you aren't able to identify, make a note to yourself not to buy them in the future. We pay too much for our food to buy inferior-quality products.

Remember to also check your herbs and spices. If you buy pre-mixed seasoning blends, make sure they contain only the pure ingredients. Avoid buying brands with hydrolyzed vegetable protein, MSG and sugars, even if they come in the form of lactose or dextrose.

Unless you are suffering from diabetes or other illness where the use of sugar is prohibited, so-called diet products should be avoided. Substitute sweeteners are suspect (in the US products containing saccharin or cyclamate carry a health warning). Reduced-fat products often are propped up by a variety of emulsifiers and fillers that are best avoided. You'd do yourself a favor by learning to eat less of something good rather than more of something dietetic.

Could you suggest a tasty mix of spices for roast chicken to use instead of a prepared chicken spice with MSG? Could you also suggest a substitute for American graham crackers? — Edith Lotzof, Netanya

I don't like any kind of spice mixtures since you don't really know what you're getting in them and they add a kind of standardized flavor to everything. There are many ways to season a chicken — by adding salt, pepper, paprika, chopped onion and/or garlic; putting a handful of parsley, celery leaves and dill in the bottom of the pan; or rubbing the chicken with sage, honey, maple syrup, date syrup or olive oil seasoned with garlic and rosemary — the variations are endless.

As for graham crackers, Israelis use Petit Beurre biscuits instead of graham crackers for cheesecake crusts. The Greenberg supermarket chain's President's Choice line has some ginger cookies that could be suitable for some recipes.

What is demerara sugar? In your halla article ("Let them eat bread," September 18) you do not mention letting the yeast rise in warm water and sugar before mixing it with flour in any of your recipes. Why is this? Can I not let it rise first? I can only get fresh yeast on my kibbutz and that is how I always was told to work with yeast.

Why must I be sure to knead the dough clockwise? I have never heard of doing this before. Is it a custom or is there a scientific reason behind it? — Adele Raemer, Kibbutz Nirim Demerara sugar is a less refined version of sugar, as opposed to the standard brown sugar available here, which is refined sugar coated with molasses. Demerara sugar is light brown in color and a delicious addition to hot drinks and baked goods.

The recipes in the halla article, other than my own, belong to the woman I interviewed, Niva Weiss. Her method is to not proof the yeast first, whether she uses fresh yeast or not. When I use shmirit, which is granulated, I add it directly to the flour. When I use fresh yeast, I like to proof it first separately. I personally think it blends better, plus it's a way to check if it's really fresh and working.

Kneading clockwise is really a custom rather than a rule. The purpose of it is to ensure that the kneader works in an even rhythm, distributing his/her efforts over the entire dough, rather than working on some parts more than others without realizing it.

The splendor and squalor of Jaffa

Close Encounters
By Allan Rabinowitz

You can explore compact old Jaffa, now part of Tel Aviv, for a half day or more, easily finding grit and glamour, dirt and development, fillets and falafel.

Located south of Tel Aviv's center, the approach to Jaffa is marked by an Ottoman clock tower. Built at the beginning of the 20th century to mark the 25th anniversary of the Turkish Sultan's rule, the tower witnessed the British conquest during World War I. Near the clock tower there was a wall protecting the port and the oldest portion of the city, and a gate, called the Jerusalem Gate, from which stretched the narrow and dangerous road to Jerusalem's Jaffa Gate.

Although smaller than Jerusalem, Jaffa has been as buffeted by the currents of history as it has been by those of sea and wind.

Walk west, up the hill from the clock tower. In the large building complex comprised of both Ottoman and Crusader elements, sits the Jaffa Museum, housing artifacts from the earliest Jaffa settlement (but hurry, it closes at 1 p.m.).

Continue up the hill to Kikar Kedumim and descend to the visitor center (free admission) beneath the plaza where displays broadly sketch the dramas which unfolded in this multi-layered port (a guide with a numbered map is available in the visitors' center and in the kiosk in Kikar Kedumim).

The Egyptians controlled a port here 3,500 years ago. Phoenicians shipped cedars from Lebanon here by sea then carried them overland to Jerusalem to be used in the construction of the First Temple by King Solomon.

The prophet Jonah set sail from this port to escape his mission from God. During the Hasmonean Revolt, the Jews of Jaffa were promised safe passage by ship, then treacherously drowned, prompting Judah the Maccabee to burn the port (some of the ruins date back to the Hasmonean rebuilding of the port).

The apostle Peter stayed in Jaffa at the house of Simon the tanner and had a vision encouraging the admission of pagans to the church. Peter's visit is marked by St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church, the most striking building in the plaza. Tradition holds that an earlier church on the spot accommodated Napoleon when he besieged Jaffa in 1799 (at the southern end of the city stand segments of the city wall breached by Napoleon).

Narrow alleys lead down to the port. The route passes a house traditionally associated with Simon the tanner, which has for generations been in the possession of an Armenian family (and not officially open for visits).

At the port, where fishing and tourist boats bob along the quays, commercial shipping sailed until the 1960s, using a channel that had been blasted through the rocks in the previous century.

Jaffa: a birds-eye view

Turn left along the port and you'll find a surprising number of fish restaurants interspersed among old warehouses. Walk all the way to the end, and you can follow the stone breakwater along the other side of the port's channel all the way to where it juts into the Mediterranean.

According to Greek mythology, a beautiful nymph was once chained to one of those protruding rocks. Perseus beheaded the sea monster guarding Andromeda and the head tumbled into the sea and became the reefs of Jaffa. Perseus bore Andromeda to Jaffa, where they wed and lived happily.

Those rocks later prevented ships from approaching land, and in the 19th century pilgrims were lowered into boats to be rowed ashore, or carried upon the shoulders of porters. Looking back up the hillside, terraced with old dwellings and religious institutions, you have the vantage point of the Jewish and Christian pilgrims who, for hundreds of years, entered the Holy Land from this port of entry.

If you climb back up the steps to Kikar Kedumim and keep going to the top of the hill, among the beautifully tended lawns, gardens and paths you can find a lovely view of Tel Aviv's spreading neighborhoods and high towers to the north. It is hard to believe that 90 years ago all this was sand dune, and the spot where you stand was the city.

In contrast to this glimpse at the beginning of modernity, if you walk east down the hill you will come to the remains of an Egyptian gateway dating back to the time of Ramses II, about 1250 BCE.

Just to the south of this hill, you can roam around the network of old Ottoman alleys now lined with shops and galleries displaying a wide variety of art, some of it of stunning quality. This neighborhood was a warren for crime, drugs and prostitution in the 1950s until its redevelopment in the 1960s. Yet its history, of course, is far richer than that.

Among these alleys stood some of the hostels that housed both Jewish and Christian pilgrims. At the western end of Simat Mazal Dagim (across the staircase from the Toutouse Restaurant), stands a building that served as a hostel for Jews from 1740 and provided a synagogue as well (it was reopened by Libyan Jews after 1948 and is still in use).

Along Yefet Street, the main north-south road just east of this hill, are old soot-caked buildings which once housed some of the earliest offices of the major Zionist organizations. The first and second aliyot (waves of immigration) of early Zionists all landed here, among them David Ben-Gurion, writer S.Y. Agnon, artist Reuven Rubin and countless others. Many took one look at the teeming, squalid city and headed back to the ship.

On the other side of Yefet Street, near the clock tower, begins the Jaffa flea market, where you can buy anything from antique furniture to broken wagon wheels, rusted iron filigree, toilets, tools, used shoes and X-rated videos. The buildings, with overhanging porches and elaborate stonework which once exuded 19th-century charm, are now dilapidated. The streets are filthy and the salesman brusque, slick hustlers, but the visual stimuli and the characters can be fascinating if you are in the right frame of mind.

If you follow Rehov Beit Eshel from the clock tower, turn right at the first side street and look for a long indoor aisle, where Tel Aviv locals can be seen browsing among stalls selling new, stylish clothes at presumably cut-rate prices.

But most importantly, where else can you find a horse-drawn wagon piled with grain bags standing at a street corner beside a row of naked chipped mannequins, while a long-haired old man shuffles by in slippers, carrying a cup of tea in a saucer and singing Stevie Wonder's "Isn't She Lovely...?" Such a possibility in itself makes a flea-market browsing worthwhile.

From the Tel Aviv central bus station, the No. 45 bus reaches Jaffa.

Keeping it Casual

Flair

By Greer Fay Cashman

IN JUST a few more days you'll be able to start comfortably wearing some of your new fall/winter acquisitions. Some people make a point of donning them for Rosh Hashana regardless of the temperature. But in a climate like Israel's, this is tantamount to creating your own Turkish bath.

Now, at least in the evenings, the weather seems okay for high-necked sweaters and lined and quilted jackets. Fall/winter, at least in this part of the world, is more a suit season than spring/summer, and suit trends for both men and women are more casual than formal this year. Stiff tailoring has given way to a softer, easier and more comfortable look.

While many fashion-conscious men still prefer to team a shirt and tie with a suit—even one of the more sporty variety—turtleneck sweaters are increasingly becoming the vogue. Perhaps it's because they make men look more macho and women more feminine. That's certainly the message conveyed by designers such as Ralph Lauren and Hugo Boss.

Unlike shirts and blouses, which gape whenever they're a little too tight, sweaters adjust like another layer of skin to the shape of the body. And unless the body in question is grossly out of shape, sweaters tend to be more flattering than shirts.

Other areas of clothing in which men and women are on the same track include the semi-fitted white shirt and velvet jacket. While Dorin Frankfurt's velvet jackets in her D.F. menswear line are certainly theatrical, especially when paired with tone-on-tone satin shirts, they are still a long way from being formal. The cut of the jackets in her women's line suggests more fun than formality.

Frankfurt is a little more generous in her cut than some of her contemporaries, who are more inclined toward the long, lean look than the more roomy silhouette.

Even the most obviously casual attire tends to be fairly lean, with the exception of parkas and other sporty jackets.

Keeping it casual used to be a case of looking sloppy, letting it hang really loose to camouflage certain excesses. But casual this season has been finely honed. If you want to trot out in your new gear, get on the scale first to make sure you can wear it.

OVER the last decade, tournament bidding has become more and more aggressive and competitive. One reason is that people like to bid a lot.

Another is that there's a popular strategy in today's tournament world known as "Green Light." The strategy works like this: When you're not vulnerable versus vulnerable and the opponents have shown at least game-going values, you can bid more aggressively because they're not likely to double you—they would prefer to bid their game or slam. This is especially true at matchpoint (or Top-Bottom) play, where a score of plus 500 can be a bottom when compared with other pairs' scores of 600 or more for a vulnerable game.

Thus, when you are at favorable vulnerability, you can overcall and preempt with less strength than you normally would and try to throw a monkey wrench into the opponents' bidding. The danger of this strategy is that partner will take you for a real bid when you have a light one and you'll get too high, doubled, down four tricks for a bottom. Therefore, you must have an agreement with your partner that when you are "favorable" you may make "green light" bids. An extension of this idea can be seen by studying today's deal. It was the first board of the semifinals of the World Open Pairs, played in September in Lille, France. The heroes are Heini Berger (sitting West) and Davies Guttmann (East), from Vienna. They were on the Austrian Maccabiah bridge team last summer in Jerusalem and Guttmann can usually be seen at the Tel Aviv Bridge Festival held each year in February. (By the way, this year the tournament begins January 28 and goes through the first week of February.)

The bidding began with a light one-club opening by North (a preempt of three clubs might better describe his hand) and a pass by Guttmann. South jump-shifted to two hearts, showing a slam-going hand. Now Berger made a brave three-diamond overcall and caught his partner with the perfect hand. Guttmann was able to bid four spades.

This interesting call is known as a "fit-showing jump." Since East had passed over one club, he was not likely to hold a long, strong spade suit. Thus, his jump to four spades described a hand with only five spades and diamond support. This contract would have been down one, so South was really fixed. If he had doubled, he would have received a poor score for plus 100 (others were making four hearts for plus 420). Instead, he bid five hearts, which became the final contract.

Berger led the king of diamonds and Guttmann gave count with the 8. This showed an even number of diamonds. Berger now cashed his ace of diamonds and switched accurately to a spade. Guttmann's ace was the setting trick.

To review, Green Light strategy (aggressive overcalls and preempts) is usually reserved for favorable vulnerability, where you are unlikely to be doubled by the opponents. But if you listen closely to your opponents' bidding and hear that they hold slam values, the same strategy may be applied. Just make sure partner is on the same wavelength. If you make such bids as West did without letting partner in on the secret (before you sit down to play), partner will think your bid is the real thing, and your Green Light strategy may crash!

Chess Alexander the great

By NIGEL SHORT

ALEXANDER Morozovitch is the man, metaphorically speaking, on steroids this year, winning just about everything in sight, or perhaps I should say out of sight: Kishinev, Perm and Tomsk, the scenes of three of his recent triumphs, sound more like characters from "the Wombles" than venues for top-class chess tournaments. Apparently though, he also plays in more accessible places such as St Petersburg, which is where he has just won the Russian Championship.

Morozovitch can, perhaps, consider himself a little lucky in this event. He won from a dead lost position against Alisa Galliamova (the former Mrs. Ivanchuk) and the arbitrary (Buchholz) tie-break system worked narrowly in his favour.

I am not sure how he would have fared against Peter Svidler, had there been a play-off. Not too well I suspect. Still there was nothing the least bit fortunate about this important game against the highly ranked Sergei Rublevsky. It is a fine demonstration of the power of the two bishops. White: Morozovitch Black: Rublevsky St Petersburg, 7.8.1998 1. e4 c5 2. d3 e6 3. dxc5 a6 4. g3 b5 5. d2 b7 6. d3 This is the sort of rubbish I have tried myself against Kasparov when I have been short of something better to play. White's slow build-up does though have the advantage of often being underestimated. 6... d6 7. 0-0 8. b3 9. d5 10. f4 d5 11. e5 12. d3 13. c4! A nice thematic thrust posing the question to the black centre. 13... bxc3 14. bxc3 a5? Not relevant at this juncture. Castling makes more sense. 15. b1 b8 16. f5!

Qc8 It was not absolutely clear that the pawn was taboo e.g. 16... cxf5 17. Qf4 g5 18. e6 gxf4 19. exd7+ exd7 20. dxf4 although White would have a significant initiative for his negligible investment 17. Bxb8 18. fxe6 19. Qf4 Here goes the bishop; it is needed to support the d-pawn and therefore cannot retreat. 19... 0-0 20. Bxc6 fxe6 21. Qf4 e6 22. Bx4 Bd7 23. Bb1 Bb8 24. Bxb8+ Bxb8 25. Bb5 Black's position is decidedly unpleasant. For a while Rublevsky makes a good bash at defending it. 25... Bc8 26. c4 Ba6 27. Qh3 Qf7 28. Bb1 Changing fronts. 28... a3? was also an idea. 28... dxc4 29. dxc4 Bxc4 30. Bxh7 Qd4 31. Bb5+ Bf8 32. Qf1! Bxf3+ 32... Bxe2? allows 33. Bxd4 cxd4 34. Bb8+ Qf7 35. Bxb8 33. Bx13 Bd5 34. Bxd5 exd5

A beginner might consider the Black position to be reasonable, or better even, in view of the two connected passed pawns. In fact it is totally lost. 35. Qb5! Nailing the knight to the board. 35... g3 36. Qd2 Qd8 37. e6 c4 38. Qf1 Moving over just to keep an eye on the pawns. They are not going anywhere fast. 38... a4 39. Qe2 Qf6 40. Bb4+ Qe7 41. Qa5 Qd6 42. Qd8 a4 43. e7+ Qxe7 44. Qe7 The knight is lost. Black's pawns will follow soon so therefore he resigned.

Koor increases ECI stake

Koor Industries yesterday announced it has increased its stake in ECI Telecom to 19.5 percent. Israel's largest holding company acquired 498,400 shares for a price of $30 to $35 per share by exercising options on the Chicago Board of Options. In addition the conglomerate has exercised an option it had given to US investment house Lehman Brothers and had purchased another 197,520 shares at $35 each.

Isair leases jet planes for $40m.

Isair has yesterday announced that it has leased two Boeing 737-700 jet planes for some $40 million. The company leased the planes from a European company, which it declined to name. Isair will use the planes for its flights between Tel Aviv and Eilat and on charter flights to Europe. The company said that the agreement is for five years.

Moody's gives Lebanese banks low rating

Moody's Investors Service, the US ratings agency, reiterated its poor rating for Lebanon's banks due to their reliance on government debt for profit rather than consumer and corporate lending. The Daily Star newspaper reported. Due to a lack of sound balance sheets, Lebanese banks don't warrant a financial strength rating of "D+" or higher, the report said. Moody's said the banking system in Lebanon is "far too complacent" about the exposure of the nation's banks to Treasury bill debt and the risks of government default and a currency devaluation, the report said.

Lebanon's central bank has urged the 70 commercial banks to consolidate in a nation that before 1975, when a 16-year civil broke out, was a financial center of the Middle East.

Bloomberg

Brazil to cut spending, taxes

BRASILIA (Bloomberg) - Brazil said yesterday it will cut spending and raise taxes to slash its $60 billion budget deficit by about 40 percent in a bid to bolster its currency and win aid from international lenders.

The measures, worth 28 billion reais ($23.5 billion) next year, should pave the way for $30 billion in aid from the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and other lenders.

Brazil needs the money to bolster foreign exchange reserves that have fallen by $30 billion in recent months as investors pulled capital out of the country over concern the real might be devalued.

"We are fully capable of facing up to financial turbulence through actions on the domestic front," Finance Minister Pedro Malan said. "The challenge is set. [Without these steps], we're on the road to fiscal insolvency."

Concern that Brazil, the world's ninth largest economy, may be forced to let its currency slide even as interest rates of more than 40% threaten to topple the economy into recession helped drive down global stock markets and the US dollar today.

The measures were in line with investor expectations. Analysts said, however, that confidence will remain shaky until it becomes clear that the Brazilian congress will approve them.

"Now all eyes are off Malan and his economic team and on the congress," said Carl Ross, head of Latin American sovereign research at Bear Stearns & Co.

The measures include 15.9 billion reais in tax increases, 8.7 billion reais in government spending cuts and cuts in social security spending, such as pensions, to save 3.5 billion reais.

Projected savings will grow to 34 billion reais in 2000 and 38 billion reais in 2001.

Even if Brazil succeeds in restoring investor confidence, it will take time for interest rates to decline. That means it's probably too late for the country to avoid slipping into recession. The economy will shrink 1% in 1999, the government said, after expanding 0.5% this year. Growth should rebound to 3% in 2000, 4% in 2001.

Specific measures include an increase in a financial transaction tax to 0.38% for 1999, from 0.20%. The rate would fall to 0.30% in 2000. This applies on all transactions, including checks and bank withdrawals.

Retired government workers, now tax exempt, will begin to be taxed at a rate of 11% on their pensions. The total raised from taxes on government employees is about $3.6 billion.

President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, speaking in a televised address Tuesday night, said the measures would help restore confidence in the nation's currency. Speculation that the deficit would force Brazil to devalue has prompted an exodus of $30 billion in the past two months.

Running a deficit has also forced Brazil to maintain high interest rates to keep the real strong. Overnight lending rates of 42% have dampened consumer spending, prompted companies to lay off workers and threaten to throw the economy into recession next year.

Statistics bureau:

Factory investments drop 3%

By DAVID ZEV HARRIS

Imports of investment goods bound for the country's factories declined three percent in September, according to a wide range of economic data published yesterday by the Central Bureau of Statistics.

At the same time, the report on activity in August and September, highlighted a stabilization in the number of unemployed, a low growth rate in industrial production, and a considerable rise in inflation.

The bureau issued a rider with the statistics, saying that there is tremendous volatility in the percentage changes across the board, from one month to the next. "This situation makes it difficult to analyze the different trends and in particular spotting turning points in activity."

September's 3% decline in the import of investment goods, a traditional sign of economic slowdown, was specifically felt in the import of machinery (down 10%). On the other hand, there was an increase in the import of vehicles. The 3% fall was far less sharp than the 9%-13% decline seen during the four previous months.

Unemployment has stabilized, according to the bureau, having changed little since April. This statement was made on the basis of the earliest figures for August unemployment. Meanwhile, the number of employees, including foreign workers not from the territories, increased 1% in July and August, having remained stable since January.

Industrial production increased 2% in each of the three months to September 1, following rises of 3%-4% from January to May. The main cause of the limited overall growth here is proving to be stability in the construction and heavy industries, offset by positive growth in the electric, electronics, plastics, chemicals, textiles, and clothing industries.

Foreign tourist nights in Israeli hotels increased by only 2% after jumps of 8%-19% during the previous six months. However, this pattern is still an improvement on the figures that began declining at the end of 1995 and were further hit by the terrorist attacks in early spring 1996.

Trade exports, excluding diamonds, shrank 7% in September, after declines of 10%-14% in the previous three months. Trade imports, excluding diamonds, fuel, ships, and aircraft, continued to decline, a run that began in February.

During August and September the shekel's exchange rate against the basket of major currencies depreciated 48% in annual terms. The consumer price index reached an annualized 8% in September, having steadily risen since it stood at 2% between January and March.

Soros still holding stake in El-Rov

By DAN GERSTENFELD

US-based financier George Soros has yet to shed his holdings in the El-Rov Israel real-estate company, despite his decision to close his emerging-market fund.

Two funds managed by the Hungarian-born investment guru currently hold some 25.2 percent of El-Rov, the TASE traded company which is controlled by businessman Alfred Akrov. The funds, Quantum Emerging Growth and Emerging Dolphin, purchased 14.4% of El-Rov on December 1996 and increased their stake gradually since then.

The funds have purchased the shares for sums ranging between NIS 10 to NIS 22 per share, compared with NIS 18 at the opening of the trading day yesterday.

The announcement by Soros last week that he plans to close the Emerging Growth Funds has prompted speculation he is looking to sell all his holdings in El-Rov, although it was reported the Soros's flagship Quantum Fund, which has assets of $8.7 billion, would likely assume positions held by the emerging market fund.

Industry sources predict that the fund will approach Akrov in attempt to sell its stake. Akrov said, however, that he did not receive such an offer and has not been approached by Quantum. "I have no idea," said Akrov. "They haven't been in touch with me for some time."

Despite the fact that Soros funds have averaged a 34% annual return since 1969, his investments so far in Israeli companies have been less impressive.

Soros has also invested in wireless operator Geotek Technologies, which recently asked a US court for Chapter 11 protection against creditors, and graphic-design developer Indigo, which is currently traded well below the price Soros paid for its shares.

El-Rov is a public property-development and investment company with subsidiaries in the real-estate, hi-tech, industry, tourism and investment fields.

Gov't seeks 2-year minimum-wage freeze

By DAVID ZEV HARRIS

This year's budgetary arrangements bill includes a proposal to prevent a real increase in the minimum wage for the next two years.

The Treasury bill, which accompanies the 1999 state budget states: "The minimum wage in Israel is one of the highest in the Western world and in recent years has been one of the main reasons for the layoff of workers, mainly in the labor intensive industries."

The Treasury's calculations suggest that unless this legislation is accepted, the minimum wage will increase by three percent above the expected inflation rate in 1999. The Treasury is proposing that the increase for the next two years be merely in line with the rise in inflation. The ministry has set a 1999 inflation target of 4%.

For the last two years, the ministry has attempted to pass similar legislation, but MKs on both sides of the house, led by Hisadrut Chairman Amir Peretz (Labor) and Labor and Social Affairs Committee chairman Maxim Levy (Gesher) have defeated any such move.

"I will oppose this proposal, especially in light of the present uncertainty in the consumer price index and consequently the average wage," said Peretz. "If [Finance Minister Yaakov] Neeman can't control the wages of senior public officials, then he mustn't be allowed to do this to the workers."

The Treasury's prediction is for unemployment to rise next year to as much as 9.3%, compared to the predicted 9.1% for 1998. This assumes the status quo remains. However, a slowdown in the rise of the minimum wage would lead to a slowdown in the increase in unemployment, according to Neeman's spokesman Motti Sherf. This would not necessarily result in an actual cut in the jobs total though, he added.

Brussels to see first Israeli share offer

By DAN GERSTENFELD

Pro-Laser, a Rosh Ha'ayin based developer of systems for automatic optical inspection, intends to become the first Israeli company to go public on the Brussels Nouveau Marche stock market.

The company wishes to raise some 330 million Belgian francs ($9.7m.) on the American-style European market, based on a price of 330 francs per share. The company has an option to add another 150,000 shares to the offering, in which some 25 percent of the company would be floated.

Pro-Laser was founded as part of the Advanced Technologies Center at Temed Industrial Park next to Dimona in April 1992 and since 1994 operates as a private company.

The Nouveau Marche is part of the Euro N.M. market, an alliance between the stock markets of Paris, Brussels, Frankfurt, and Amsterdam designed as pan-European network of stock markets for high-growth innovative companies. The European bourse is aimed at attracting European high-tech companies which in the past had to raise capital in the US.

Among other stocks that gained, Bezeq rose 1.64 percent to NIS 12.39. Israel's largest telephone company said it is about to sign a strategic cooperation agreement with an unspecified multinational company.

Bank Leumi fell 1.81 percent to NIS 5.47. The Bank of Israel is investigating a complaint that Bank Leumi, Israel's No. 2 bank by assets, has delayed processing of applications for the new Visa-Alpha credit card.

European stocks fell for the first time this week, led by Royal Dutch Petroleum Co. and Allianz AG. Companies that led gainers in the past two days fell the most, on concern slowing world economic growth means their prices aren't justified by their profit outlooks.

"There are still doubts about US growth and its impact on Europe," said Wilfried Lagarde, who helps manage $700 million at Jean-Pierre Pinatone in Paris. "That makes me extremely cautious. If a stock rises a lot, I'll take my profit."

The Bloomberg Europe 500 Index fell 3.8 points, or 2.1 percent, to 176.60, posting its biggest loss in three weeks and paring its gains in the past two weeks to 3.8 percent.

Concern about the stability of Brazil's currency and economy pushed down Banco Bilbao Vizcaya SA and other companies that do business in Latin America. BBV, Spain's No. 2 bank, fell 100 pesetas to 1,810. Telefonica SA, Spain's main telephone company which is also the biggest phone company in Brazil, fell 110 pesetas to 6,270.

Allianz, Europe's second-biggest insurer, fell 16 marks to 547, paring Tuesday's 17.45-mark gain. Royal Dutch, which owns 60 percent of the Royal Dutch/Shell Group, fell 2.4 guilders to 88.7, paring Tuesday's 4.5 guilders rise.

UBS SA, Europe's biggest bank, fell 3.5 Swiss francs to 349. Until yesterday (Wed.), it had gained 30 percent this month. ING Groep NV fell 3.2 guilders to 84.9.

Australian stocks rose as lower-than-expected third quarter inflation fueled hopes the central bank will cut interest rates. Hopes for lower rates also boosted stocks in Thailand and Singapore.

National Australia Bank Ltd. and Telstra Corp. led as Australia's All Ordinaries rose 32.3 points, or 1.3 percent, to 2,615.2, its highest since Sept. 24. Singapore's benchmark index rose 2.5 percent and Thailand's rose 3.5 percent.

"Uppermost in people's minds is the interest rate cycle and they've set their equity portfolios in order to exploit an easing in rates," said Justin Arter, director of research at J B Werr & Son in Melbourne. He favors Telstra and major banks over resource stocks because of concern global growth may slow and has a year-end target for the index of 2720.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq posted the biggest gains, led by Dell Computer, Intel, and Sun Microsystems. Similarly, the Dow's strongest gainers included IBM and Hewlett-Packard.

After rebounding sharply in the past few weeks, the market has lost momentum in recent days amid worries that the global economy remains too troubled to justify higher stock prices.

The Standard and Poor's 500 rose 2.79 to 1,068.13, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 19.72 to 1,737.35.

Declining issues outnumbered gainers by a narrow margin on the New York Stock Exchange, with 1,458 up, 1,530 down, and 523 unchanged.

Nasdaq advancers finished with a small lead over decliners.

NYSE volume totaled 675.17 million shares as of 4 p.m., vs. 757.18 million in the previous session.

The NYSE composite index fell 0.12 to 527.65, and the American Stock Exchange composite index rose 2.14 to 634.52.

Tel Aviv

Israeli stocks were mixed yesterday, with gains by Koor Industries, the country's largest industrial concern, offset by declines in shares of Nice Systems, which extinguished speculation of a takeover.

Koor rose 3.77 percent to NIS 330, buoyed by greater-than-expected earnings at ECI Telecommunications, in which it holds an 18 percent stake. Nice dropped 7.68 percent to 81.70 after US-based Converse Technology Inc. said it wouldn't buy its rival in the call-center market.

That left the Maof Index of the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange's 25 largest companies down 0.02 percent at 286.20.

Eleven stocks fell and eight rose. "Nice was gaining all week, but it ran out of gas when the takeover talk was put to rest," said Ira Stokowicz, a trader at Israel Brokerage and Investments.

Clal Electronics, which owns 19 percent of ECI, also climbed, gaining 2.2 percent to NIS 511. ECI, Israel's largest maker of telecommunications systems, said third-quarter profit before a one-time charge rose 33 percent as sales improved.

Nice had risen 50 percent since it hit a low of $4.20 on October 13, and soared 9 percent yesterday, as speculation mounted about a takeover attempt by Converse. The stock plunged yesterday after both companies denied talk of a buyout.

Among other stocks that gained, Bezeq rose 1.64 percent to NIS 12.39. Israel's largest telephone company said it is about to sign a strategic cooperation agreement with an unspecified multinational company.

Bank Leumi fell 1.81 percent to NIS 5.47. The Bank of Israel is investigating a complaint that Bank Leumi, Israel's No. 2 bank by assets, has delayed processing of applications for the new Visa-Alpha credit card.

European stocks fell for the first time this week, led by Royal Dutch Petroleum Co. and Allianz AG. Companies that led gainers in the past two days fell the most, on concern slowing world economic growth means their prices aren't justified by their profit outlooks.

"There are still doubts about US growth and its impact on Europe," said Wilfried Lagarde, who helps manage $700 million at Jean-Pierre Pinatone in Paris. "That makes me extremely cautious. If a stock rises a lot, I'll take my profit."

The Bloomberg Europe 500 Index fell 3.8 points, or 2.1 percent, to 176.60, posting its biggest loss in three weeks and paring its gains in the past two weeks to 3.8 percent.

Concern about the stability of Brazil's currency and economy pushed down Banco Bilbao Vizcaya SA and other companies that do business in Latin America. BBV, Spain's No. 2 bank, fell 100 pesetas to 1,810. Telefonica SA, Spain's main telephone company which is also the biggest phone company in Brazil, fell 110 pesetas to 6,270.

Allianz, Europe's second-biggest insurer, fell 16 marks to 547, paring Tuesday's 17.45-mark gain. Royal Dutch, which owns 60 percent of the Royal Dutch/Shell Group, fell 2.4 guilders to 88.7, paring Tuesday's 4.5 guilders rise.

UBS SA, Europe's biggest bank, fell 3.5 Swiss francs to 349. Until yesterday (Wed.), it had gained 30 percent this month. ING Groep NV fell 3.2 guilders to 84.9.

Australian stocks rose as lower-than-expected third quarter inflation fueled hopes the central bank will cut interest rates. Hopes for lower rates also boosted stocks in Thailand and Singapore.

National Australia Bank Ltd. and Telstra Corp. led as Australia's All Ordinaries rose 32.3 points, or 1.3 percent, to 2,615.2, its highest since Sept. 24. Singapore's benchmark index rose 2.5 percent and Thailand's rose 3.5 percent.

"Uppermost in people's minds is the interest rate cycle and they've set their equity portfolios in order to exploit an easing in rates," said Justin Arter, director of research at J B Werr & Son in Melbourne. He favors Telstra and major banks over resource stocks because of concern global growth may slow and has a year-end target for the index of 2720.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq posted the biggest gains, led by Dell Computer, Intel, and Sun Microsystems. Similarly, the Dow's strongest gainers included IBM and Hewlett-Packard.

After rebounding sharply in the past few weeks, the market has lost momentum in recent days amid worries that the global economy remains too troubled to justify higher stock prices.

The Standard and Poor's 500 rose 2.79 to 1,068.13, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 19.72 to 1,737.35.

Declining issues outnumbered gainers by a narrow margin on the New York Stock Exchange, with 1,458 up, 1,530 down, and 523 unchanged.

Nasdaq advancers finished with a small lead over decliners.

NYSE volume totaled 675.17 million shares as of 4 p.m., vs. 7

NBA cancels rest of November games

NEW YORK (Reuters) - The National Basketball Association said yesterday that it has cancelled the rest of its schedule for November and will make no more announcements regarding cancellations for the remainder of the lockout.

The announcement was made by NBA deputy commissioner Russ Granik.

"It is not going to be possible to play games in November," Granik told a press conference. "We don't expect to be making continuous announcements regarding cancellations each week."

More than 200 players, owners and league officials were due to meet late yesterday afternoon in an effort to end the owner-imposed lockout, which began July 1.

St Johnstone to play Rangers in League Cup final

EDINBURGH (Reuters) - St Johnstone reached their first final in 29 years when they defeated Hearts 3-0 in a Scottish League Cup semifinal on Tuesday night.

Goals from Nicklas Bendtner, Allan Preston and George O'Boyle gave the Perth club a dream date in the final against Rangers next month.

It was sweet revenge for St Johnstone manager Sandy Clark, who was sacked by Hearts four years ago.

When St Johnstone played in the League Cup final in 1969, they lost 1-0 to the other Glasgow club, Celtic.

Longest-serving IOC member dies

BUCHAREST (AP) - Alexandru Siperco, the longest-serving member on the International Olympic Committee, has died at the age of 77.

Siperco, who had served on the IOC for 43 years since his election in 1955, died at his Bucharest home Monday of a heart attack, according to the Romanian Olympic Committee.

Siperco, born in Târgu Jiu in 1920, was president of the Romanian Olympic Committee from 1952 to 1959.

He was an IOC executive board member from 1979 to 1986, and IOC vice president from 1982 to 1986.

Siperco became the "doyen" of the IOC when the Grand Duke of Luxembourg, who had served on the IOC since 1946, resigned earlier this year.

Ran Oz becomes first Israeli pro ice hockey player

By LIONEL GAFFEN

Tel Avivian Ran Oz became the first Israeli professional ice hockey player in history earlier this year when he signed a one-year contract with the Dutch first division team the Amsterdam Tigers.

The team's head coach is Alex Andjelic, of international repute, who spends his summers with Roger Nielson's hockey camps.

Oz, 21, lives in with his parents in Bnei Brak. He first laced his skates on when he was 10, a late age for most hockey players. He began to play in the tiny Ramat Gan rink, and immediately began to show promise. At 14, he was invited to join the national team which competed in the world championship qualifiers in South Africa.

Oded Orqill, an Israeli living in Canada, saw him play, and after inviting Oz to visit him in Canada, made a special trip here to convince Oz's parents to allow their son to play hockey and finish his schooling in Canada. Oz's dream had come true, as he was invited to try out and play Junior 'A' hockey for the Toronto Marlboros, one of Canada's top junior teams. For the next two seasons, Oz toiled for the Marlboros.

He admits that moving to Canada by himself and leaving his family and friends behind was rough, and after the first few months he was ready to pack it in and come home, but he had some inspiration to keep him going: "I used to watch the Rocky movies, where the underdog manages to triumph against all the odds, and I felt like that, and just kept on trying."

Oz was so impressive as a player for the Marlboros, that after his second season, he was drafted by the Ran Oz in national team colors.

(Lionel Gaffan)

Guelf Storm, a senior team in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), a professional league just below the NHL.

Oz then had a tough choice to make: OHL, on the way to the NHL, or return to Israel to do his army service. He was strongly influenced by Semyon Yakubovich, the national hockey coach during those years. His advice to the teenager was to first fulfill his obligations as a man before seeking fame and fortune.

Oz returned to do his army service, and for the past couple of years has lived in Metulla, in order to be close to the Canada Center and to participate with Team Israel at the world championships in Lithuania in 1996, in Andorra in 1997 and this past April in South Africa.

Mac. TA look for turnaround against Red Star

By ELI GRONER

Maccabi Tel Aviv's players can't be blamed if they think they are playing against a mirror image of themselves when they take on Red Star in a EuroLeague contest in Belgrade tonight (Channel 1, 9:30 p.m.).

The two teams have had very similar seasons so far. Both have struggled in EuroLeague play (Maccabi is 1-3; Belgrade is 0-4) while playing reasonably well in their local leagues (Belgrade is 4-1 in Yugoslavia). The two clubs find themselves next to each other at the bottom of Group B, with neither able to afford a loss tonight.

The Yugoslavs are hoping for another similarity as well. Just as Oded Katash's debut last week sparked a turnaround for the Israeli, Red Star is hoping that tonight's return of Igor Rakocević - who has missed the entire season to date because of an injury - will finally get Belgrade in the win column. Like Katash, Rakocević is a young guard who is considered his country's best. The 20-year old was the scoring leader and MVP at last summer's European Under-22 Championship. In the final against Slovenia, he scored 37 points.

Rakocević will assist the team's best player so far this season, Milenko Topic. Topic has averaged an astounding 39.5 minutes a game in EuroLeague action while averaging 16.3 ppg on 60% from the field (including 43% from three-point land).

Another factor in the defending Yugoslav League champions' favor is that this will be its highly anticipated first "real" home game this season. Until now, its only home game, against Cibona Zagreb, was played behind closed doors because of a FIBA punishment meted out last year.

Earlier this week, the team's point guard, Luka Pavicević (a former teammate of Maccabi's Borko Radovic at Hapoel Nahariya) said, "I hope that the home-court factor will finally make the difference in our season."

Radovic has been added to the eligible roster for tonight's game because of Willie Anderson's leg injury.

Notwithstanding Anderson's absence, it's not the guard rotation that should concern coach Yoram Harush. As it will be in almost every EuroLeague matchup this season, Maccabi's primary problem looks to be at the center position. Victor Alexander can be an extremely efficient power forward, but Maccabi brass apparently assumed that he could play the pivot against Europe's finest. That hasn't been the case to date, and unless Constantin Popa makes phenomenal progress, or Maccabi decides to unload Anderson and pick up a real center, the middle will prove to be Maccabi's Achilles heel all season.

Lightning kills 11 soccer players during match - report

KINSHASA (Reuters) - A burst of lightning killed 11 members of a Congolese soccer team and injured dozens more people during a weekend match, the Congolese news agency has reported.

The lightning strike wiped out all the players fielded by the home team in the village of Bena Tshadi, in the south-central Congolese province of Eastern Kasai, the Congolese Press Agency said.

The report could not be independently confirmed.

Local investigators are blaming the lightning bolt on witchcraft because none of the players on the opposing team from nearby Basanganga village were injured, the agency reported Tuesday.

The report said that sorcery is often used in the region in an attempt to influence matches.

The two teams were tied 1-1 when the lightning struck.

More than 30 people, most standing along the sidelines, were injured by the lightning, but none of the injuries are believed to be life-threatening, the report said.

Witchcraft is often blamed throughout west and central Africa to explain natural phenomenon and illness.

In South Africa over the weekend, six players from a local team were hurt when lightning struck the playing field during a thunderstorm.

STILL IN BUSINESS - Boris Becker plays to the Stuttgart crowd yesterday.

Impressive Becker dumps Moya out of Eurocard Open

STUTTGART (Reuters) - Semi-retired Boris Becker showed he still has plenty of fight left yesterday as he came from a set behind to dump French Open champion and world No. 4 Carlos Moya out of the Eurocard Open.

The German proved he had fully recovered from an ankle injury which kept him sidelined for some eight weeks by hitting brilliant winners on his way to a 6-7 6-4 6-4 victory in his second round match against the Spaniard.

"I'm surprised to be in such good physical condition," said the former world No. 1, making a gradual exit in the ATP Tour rankings.

The three-times Wimbledon champion wasted two set points before losing the first set in a tie-break but then managed two early breaks to win the next two sets.

"I'm pleased with the way I played," added the 30-year-old. "I must still improve my serve a bit but I volleyed really well."

Becker, whose victory over Dutch qualifier Sjeng Schalken in the previous round was his first since July, will go on to meet Croatia's Goran Ivanisevic, the 14th seed, who ousted South African Wayne Ferreira 6-4 7-6.

Like Becker, Marcelo Rios showed that he had overcome his fitness problems.

The Chilean world No. 2 said he had felt fine in his match against German Tommy Haas, whom he ousted 6-3 7-5.

Rios had to retire with a sore hamstring in his semifinal against the same opponent in Lyon, France, on Saturday and has also been hampered by back pain.

Rios now faces Dutchman Jan Siemerink, the 15th seed, for a place in the quarterfinals of the $2.5 million indoor event featuring the world's top 10 players.

Pete Sampras, fighting to end the year ranked No. 1 for a record sixth consecutive time, crushed German Nicolas Kiefer 6-3, 6-4 in the late match yesterday.

If he fails to reach the quarterfinals here, the American will be replaced at No. 1 by either Rios or world No. 3 Patrick Rafter. If the Australian wins the title.

The double US Open champion beat Sweden Magnus Gustafsson in the last match of the day 6-1, 6-4.

Seventh seed Alex Corretja of Spain made an early exit, falling in straight sets to rising American Jan-Michael Gambill.

Corretja, who won his first indoor title by beating Haas in the Lyon final on Sunday, was crushed 6-2 6-4 by the 21-year-old Gambill, 50th in the world after climbing over 100 places in the ATP Tour rankings this year.

Gambill will go on to meet Briton Tim Henman, the ninth seed who needs a good showing here to secure a berth in the season-ending ATP Tour world championship which starts on November 23 in Hannover.

Briton Greg Rusedski, seeded 13th, also advanced through to the third round but he was made to work by unseeded Australian Jason Stoltenberg on an outside court.

There were three tie breaks in a close battle which Rusedski eventually won 7-6 6-7 7-6 with a service winner on match point.

The hard-hitter could still mathematically qualify for Hannover but stands only an outside chance. He will play against either Rafter or Gustafsson in the next round.

Jerusalem, Ra'anana grab last-second wins

By ELI GRONER

Last night's rare mid-week round of National Basketball League games was highlighted by two last-second victories, two long-awaited first-wins-of-the-season and one coach's resignation. When the dust had settled, Hapoel Jerusalem stayed perfect, Hapoel Holon won its fourth straight game, and Maccabi Rishon lost its third straight and its coach to boot.

Hap. J'lem 85 Mac. Rishon 83

Hapoel Jerusalem withstood a furious late run by Maccabi Rishon before two Radisav Curcic free throws with 2.4 seconds remaining iced the victory. The road victory moved Jerusalem into sole possession of first place in the standings, while pushing its overall record in league, State and Saporta Cup competitions to 14-0.

After the game, Pini Gershon confirmed rumors reported in the media during the day by announcing his resignation as Rishon's coach (see below).

A costly mistake by Jeff Kent enabled Curcic - who led all scorers with 26 points - to go to the charity stripe at the end of the game. The two were battling for the rebound off of a Kenny Williams miss when Kent fouled Curcic four meters from the basket, when Curcic wasn't even close to getting off a good shot.

Rishon was fortunate to have been that close. Jerusalem held a comfortable 82-73 advantage with just over three minutes to play, before Hapoel coach Efiy Birbaum was slapped with a technical foul after arguing a foul call. Motti Daniel (23 points) buried all four free throws, before nailing a six-foot jumper to complete a six-point possession.

With only 20 seconds remaining, Daniel tallied again to knot the score at 83.

Mac. Ra'anana 66 Galil Elyon 64

Mark Brisker swished a three-pointer as time expired to give the hosts a wild, come-from-behind victory.

Brisker's buzzer-beater capped a fantastic, final 13 seconds which saw the lead change hands three times. After two Theo Cinciciz free throws had given the northerners a 62-60 lead, Brisker converted a three-point play to give Ra'anana a one-point advantage. With just five seconds left, Galil guard Alon Stein penetrated and drew the defense towards him, before dishing the ball off to Erez Hazan who converted the easy layup, giving his club a short-lived lead.

Tomer Steinhauer led the victors with 21 points. Jamie Arnold paced all scorers with 23.

Hap. Holon 66 Mac. Haifa 60

In a game which saw host Haifa blow a nine-point first half lead and then overcome a 12-point second-half deficit, Holon played better down the stretch to eke out the victory.

Holon - which continues to be the pleasant surprise of the season - has now won four of its five games this season.

Greg Sutton led the victors with 16 points. Andrew Kennedy had 15 for Haifa.

Givat Shmuel 74 Hap. Eilat 66

After an incredibly sloppy first half by both clubs, host Givat Shmuel came out more focused in the second stanza to pull out its first win of the season. Gil Sela and Moshe Brenner - who didn't do much in the first three quarters of the game - were instrumental in the game's latter stages.

Foreigners Dennis Hopson (23 points) and Norris Coleman (19) provided most of Givat Shmuel's point production.

Ramat Gan 98 Bnei Herzliya 67

Ramat Gan vented out its seasonal frustrations by blowing out the overmatched Herzliyan in Ramat Gan last night.

James Gully and Paul Thompson paced the victors with 21 points apiece.

Gershon quits as Rishon coach

Immediately after Rishon LeZion's loss to Hapoel Jerusalem last night, Pini Gershon announced his resignation as his team's coach. Gershon - who made the announcement in a post-game radio interview - cited professional disagreements with team chairman Yitzhak Peri.

It is known that the two disagreed over the handling of the Abdul Shams-Adin situation. (Rishon's center was cut two games into the season). While the two agreed that Shams-Adin needed to be released, Gershon was furious that it was done before a suitable replacement had been found. Rishon has lost three consecutive league games since that incident, and they have been glaringly weak in the paint.

Late last night, Peri expressed displeasure at the way Gershon announced his resignation. "I'm very disappointed that Pini made it official in the media, before notifying me. That's not the way a professional organization should be run," he said. Peri added that this saga is just a minor setback for the club, "which will recover in a big way." Eli Groner

Maccabi Tel Aviv plane makes emergency landing at B-G

By ORI LEWIS

A plane carrying Maccabi Tel Aviv's hoopsters, officials and accompanying journalists to Yugoslavia yesterday was forced to turn around and make an emergency landing at Ben-Gurion Airport after experiencing engine trouble after about 30 minutes in the air.

The chartered Aeroflot Airlines Dash-8 twin turboprop carrying 32 passengers and crew landed without incident, the Israel Airports Authority said.

"The captain had detected a loss of power in one of the engines," an authority spokeswoman told The Jerusalem Post yesterday.

The party boarded an identical aircraft half an hour after landing, and arrived safely in Belgrade yesterday afternoon ahead of today's EuroLeague game against Red Star Belgrade. (See preview, Page 18)

Vialli hat-trick helps Chelsea thrash Villa

LONDON (Reuters) - Italian player-manager Gianluca Vialli scored a hat-trick as holders Chelsea knocked English premier league leaders Aston Villa out of the League Cup in style yesterday.

Vialli struck his first goals of the season after 32, 67 and 85 minutes as the Londoners won their third round tie 4-1 at Stamford Bridge.

Mark Draper had put Villa in front, while Norwegian Tore Andre Flo scored Chelsea's other goal.

But Chelsea's night was marred when captain Dennis Wise was sent off for a reckless late tackle.

Arsenal also made it to the fourth round with a 2-1 win at Derby County, thanks to a Lee Carsley own goal in the first half and a 55th-minute strike by Argentine Nelson Vivas. Dean Sturridge scored Derby's consolation.

Elsewhere Australian Harry Kewell was on target as premier league Leeds United beat first division Bradford 1-0, while Wimbledon saw off Birmingham 2-1 at St Andrews thanks to two Neal Ardley goals.

Blackburn also came through against first division opposition, winning 1-0 at Crewe with a goal by Chris Sutton.

In late results, Manchester United beat Bury 2-0 after extra time after the score at full time was goalless and Everton beat hosts Middleborough 3-2 also in extra time following 1-1 after 90 minutes.

In the Scottish Premier Division, John Spencer came back to haunt Rangers with a stunning goal on his debut for Motherwell which sank the Scottish Premier League leaders 1-0 at Fir Park.

The Scotland international striker, who has just begun a three-month loan spell at Motherwell from English premier league Everton, buried Rangers with a 54th minute volley.

Spencer began his career at Rangers and had six seasons there before moving to England where he played for Chelsea, Queens Park Rangers and Everton.

Motherwell, starting the match in bottom place, looked the hungrier team and only the excellence of Rangers' goalkeeper Lionel Charbonnier kept the home side out in front of 11,777 fans.

Islanders edge Kings; Rangers-Sabres play scoreless tie

UNIONDALE, New York (AP) - Tommy Salo stopped 20 shots for his third shutout of the season and Joe Sacco scored in the third period as the New York Islanders beat the Los Angeles Kings 1-0 Tuesday night.

Sacco's goal, his first of the season, came at 2:01 of the final period. After taking two strides over the red line, Sacco fired a slap shot toward Kings goalie Manny Legace. The puck bounced in front of the crease and went through the goalie's pads.

Salo, who has played in all eight games for New York this season, also has shutouts against Tampa Bay and St. Louis. He got a break when an apparent tying goal was disallowed with 6:15 left in the game because the net came loose before the puck crossed the goal line.

Rangers 0, Sabres 0

In New York, Dominik Hasek, with help from both his defense and goal posts, extended his shutout streak against New York to four games as the Buffalo Sabres and Rangers played to a scoreless tie.

Hasek and Rangers goaltender Mike Richter were both flawless, but Hasek only had to face 16 shots while posting the 35th shutout of his National Hockey League career.

Hasek also was lucky as three New York shots hit the posts.

Flyers 2, Blues 1

In Philadelphia, Colin Forbes deflected a nonchalant shot by Dan McGillis 28 seconds into the second period for the decisive goal, and John Vanbiesbrouck made 30 saves as the Philadelphia Flyers beat the St. Louis Blues.

The Atlantic-leading Flyers won for the first time in three games after losing to New Jersey and tying the Rangers on Saturday.

Predators 5, Canucks 4

In Nashville, Tennessee, Sergei Krivokrasov scored two goals, including the game-winner with 1:26 left, as Nashville snapped a four-game losing streak.

Krivokrasov, who also had an assist, pushed the rebound of Jamie Howard's shot through goalie Garth Snow's legs on the power play to snap a 4-0 tie.

Jeff Daniels, Tom Fitzgerald and Andrew Brunette also scored for Nashville, which blew a two-goal lead in the third period for the second straight game.
